Considering his undoubtedly great genius, we cannot but wonder, not only at his method of composition, but at the way in which he studied out his leading characters. The dominant idea of his great works evidently came to him very early, yet he kept on elaborating most of them for years, and instead of drawing his leading characters from his imagination he was constantly shaping them anew from the life-models that came in his way. Even the love-songs, that seemed to be the spontaneous movement of his feelings and his fancy, were studies from the life, and instead of singing in order to make love to his lady, he used the love affair to make him sing, not without pretty free employment of the part played by the lady herself in the charming relation. His Werther was his most impassioned production, and appeared to be the impulsive revolt of his fiery youth against the conventionalism of society; yet how variously and studiously the characters were made up out of his acquaintance with the good Kestner and his wife, and the death of his unhappy friend Jerusalem, and the melancholy mood of some of his Frankfort years. The Wilhelm Meister is full of his theatrical experiences in his early Weimar life, and while Meister is evidently the poet himself in different stages of his experience, the characters of the book, are careful studies of his friends, and even that exquisite and apparently wholly ideal sketch, the confessions of a "Fair Saint," is based upon an actual character. The Faust, which apparently was begun in 1772, when Goethe was 23 years old, and which kept throbbing in his brain until his death in 1832, was at once a great original poem and an autobiography. Faust is Goethe himself in the main stages of his career, first as the student, who turns from books to the world, to study its temptations and to see the cold spirit of denial join itself with the lusts of the flesh to lure the student to the ruin of innocence; then, in the second part, the student appears as the experienced man of the world, who at last settles down into useful work, and succeeds in solving, by benign industry, the life problem that he could not make out by his wits. Grimm, of course, finds the poet himself in Faust, and he is quite sure that the idea of Mephistopheles, the Denier, was first started by his acquaintance with Herder, who coolly analyzed every fact, and that it received its point and sting from Merck, the sharp critic, who took the wind out of all enthusiasm by his satire, and pricked every air balloon of fancy by his cuts. He is also quite sure that Margaret was suggested by Frederika, the daughter of the Pastor of Sesenheim, not because she was ruined by her lover, but because she was deserted after her heart had been won. If any of our readers would see one of the most exquisite portraits of character in love relations that has ever been made among us, let them read the charming story of Alide by Miss Emma Lazarus, of this City, upon Goethe's relations with Frederika, and it will be seen what cause the poet had for remembering always that pure and lovely girl, whose heart he broke without robbing her of her purity. Yet it will not do to interpret Faust merely by the personal traits which it embodies from the life. It is the modern man who turns from the old book-learning to the new times of materialism, and who, after much grief, settles down into practical well-doing, and finds peace from his own conscience and forgiveness from the Supreme Love.

As to Goethe's private life, opinions differ widely. He has been called by some of his critics a selfish egotist, and even a reckless voluptuary, while by others he has been exalted to the skies as a model man in personal purity as well as in kindness and fidelity. It is not easy to say exactly where the truth lies, while it is certain that the resent and more careful studies of his career are greatly to his advantage, and that Grimm, without being in all respects his eulogist, acquits him of the gravest charges against his character. He makes out that his virtue was stronger than that of lovely women whose charms fascinated him; that Lili, who figures so much in his songs, and to whom he was virtually engaged, confessed that she owed her safety to his forbearance; and that the intimacy with the Countess von Stein was wholly above reproach and within the limits of intellectual and artistic friendship, and could not possibly, under the circumstances, have been otherwise. Grimm puts a good face upon the Roman elegies, or rather he takes away their worst reproach, by making their love descriptions turn upon his relation with Christiana, whom he married, and who is represented as much after the fashion of the exuberant Roman beauties who gave such charms to the region over the Tiber in the time of Catullus and Horace. Yet Grimm does not try to disguise the undoubted fact that Goethe was peculiarly susceptible toward feminine attractions, and that he had a remarkable sense of the gentle, trusting element in womanhood, such as he embodies in his prominent heroines. Grimm's account of Goethe's love temperament is worth translation from the thirteenth lecture, thus:

"Goethe's impassioned relations prior to his Weimar period have something in common; it is Goethe himself and only that gives to the beloved the power to fascinate him. We have an Indian legend that the touch of a young maiden's hand brings trees into blossom. Goethe meets a simple and lovely personage; his heart needs a goddess; the whole flame of his nature gleams back to him from the eyes of this maiden, whose eyes were they ever so fair, without Goethe himself would never have possessed such illuminating force. Every time this natural process was repeated; after a short period the blooms came to a stop, then a slight weariness, then fading, then all is over; only the painful question remains, How was all this experience possible? Even with Lili the case was no otherwise, and that she was a little more prudent than Lotte and Frederika and the others whom I have not named, does not change the matter much. In Frau von Stein, however, Goethe for the first time met a power which had its own fire."

It is evidently Grimm's conviction that the Countess cared more for the poet than he cared for her, and that his relation with her helped his literary life without disturbing his equanimity or wronging her and her family. However this may be, and whatever may be the just interpretation of the poet's loves, it is well that our English and our American standard of propriety differs from the German standard of Goethe's circle, and that none of our leading poets have given occupation to literary gossips and scandal-mongers by so many equivocal loves as he had, and such an equivocal marriage as united him with the coarse but not heartless or stupid woman who was mother of his son. Our English and American ideas of home owe their piety as well as their purity to a far more rigid study of the Commandments and use of the Prayer-book than prevailed at the Court of Weimar, and they are not becoming worse.

Goethe is not to be understood as a dissipated or unprincipled man, for he led in the main a very tranquil life, kept hard at work to the last, and he had a code of principles of a very definite kind. He protessed to believe in God and in the immortal life, and he has written some remarkable statements of his impressions of the Christian religion, especial in its character of self-renunciation and humanity. He was somewhat adrift in his theology, and he honestly said: "I cannot for myself hold sufficiently to any one way of religious thinking in the manifold directions of my life; as poet and artist, I am polytheist; as naturalist, on the contrary, I am pantheist—the one as decidedly as the other. Do I need a God for my personality, who is well provided for. The heavenly and earthly things are so wide a kingdom that all our organs together are necessary in order to understand it. I work on, without and within always in quiet, Lied to have everybody else do the same."

Nearly the same of the ninth lecture is given to Goethe's religion, and Spinoza is represented as his master in theosophy, and as completing with Homer, Raphael, and Shakespeare, the four guides of his culture. Grimm says some very interesting things about Goethe's religion, but he does not seem to understand very well the peculiar system of Spinoza, and he is not correct in his notion that this philosopher helped Goethe most by allowing him to separate his thinking from his faith, and to leave his heart wholly to mystical emotions while his head was cool and analytic. Spinoza, on the contrary, made a certain mysticism a part of his thought, and he insisted that the severest thinking best interprets God, and opens the doors of spiritual influence. Hence Goethe was led to accept his own unstudied and unconscious productions as peculiarly justified by his creed, and to affirm that every man belonged not only to himself but to his race, and that the essential humanity sometimes invaded and overflowed the individual man. He thus explained the paradox—that, as the sensitive plant at the touch folds its leaves, after the human fashion, so man has a plant-life, and not only breathes and digests, but even dreams and thinks, and even speaks and writes, without conscious effort, under the sway of the over-soul or all pervading life. In the same way he explained apparently the characteristic in fascinating and commanding persons which he called the demoniacal and which he so strongly recognized in Napoleon. It was the inflow of the great cosmic force in some peculiar way, and according to an overruling law. In his conversation with Eckermann he once said:

"In poetry, especially in that which is unconscious, before which reason and understanding fall short, and which therefore produces effects so far surpassing all expectation, there is always something of the demoniacal. The same is true of music in the highest degree. Understanding cannot reach its elevation, and influences flow from it which master all, and of which none is able to give himself account. Therefore cannot religions worship dispense with it; it is one of the chief means of working wonders upon men. It throws itself into significant individuals, especially when they are in high places, like Frederick, and Peter the Great."

When Eckermann hinted that this demoniacal force could not be the Divinity, Goethe said:

"Dear child, what know we of the idea of the Divinity? And what can our narrow ideas tell of the highest Being? Should I, like the Turk, name it with a hundred names, I should fall far short, and, in my admiration of it, the infinite attributes, I should have said nothing."

These words give a very good idea of Goethe's interpretation of Spinoza's system of religion, and of his view of God as the all in all. They show how inadequate is Richard Holt Hutton's definition of Goethe's use of the term demoniacal in his able yet unsatisfactory essay upon Goethe and his influence. Hutton says:

"If it be expressible in one phrase at all, (which it is not,) it might be called presence of mind in combination with a keen knowledge of men. I mean that absolute and complete adequacy to every emergency which gave Napoleon his sang-froid at the very turning point of his great battles, and which, in the literary world, has secured for Johnson his Boswell, and for Goethe his Eckermann."

Goethe had a far different notion of the power that comes to strong men, and which is less their action than their visitation, less their work than the influx from the deeps of being, whether from the world of man and nature or from the spiritual world.

Goethe had the vice as well as the virtue of the Spinoza system of religion. He made more account of the intellect than of the affections and the will in his plan of life; and, kindly and laborious as he was, he sought the agreeable more than the severely true and good, and settled down too readily under things as they were. So, too, like Spinoza, he regarded mankind and womankind very much as facts of the universe, with about as much anxiety for the good of the human race as for the sunshine and the rain. He recognized perfection and imperfection, but made less account of good and evil, and while like a Greek he put away from him as far as possible sorrow and death, he, like a thorough Spinozist, left out of the account sin—the word that Christianity so constantly joins with its offers of grace and peace. This greatest of all our artists, this master poet of our time, who is claimed by Germans to be the glory of their nation and the light of the modern world, thus falls below Martin Luther, the mightiest of all Germans, in his answer to man's deepest sense and Heaven's highest bounty.

Evidently Grimm presents his hero to the whole world as the head of modern literature and art. He claims for his Faust a power great and lasting beyond that of the leaders of history—Charlemagne, Otto, the Fredericks, in war and empire, or in another line, Schiller, Lessing, or even Goethe himself—these are all faulty and perishable in comparison with Faust, who has never lived at all, and who was blown together as in dreams from the clouds. For Germans he is held up above all the ideal characters of poetry, above Hamlet, Achilles, Hector, Tasso, the Cid, Frithiof, Siegfried, and Fingal. As Faust is among men, so is Gretchen or Margaret among women, and in her presence Antigone, Iphigenia, Ophelia, Imogen, must take the second place. Grimm condescends, however, to share the glory with mankind, and to allow that Faust is the standing property of the modern nations, and he does not belong to Germany alone. The English speaking people, however, will not give a second place to Shakespeare, nor join in the rising disposition to make of a frail and mortal man a god for the worship of an age that too often forgets the God in heaven.

But a great man is greater than any of his theories or than any of our definitions, and we give to this master of beautiful art more acceptance of the supreme good than his formal creed states. We take leave of him here gratefully, and we quote with satisfaction his biographer's just tribute to his name at the close of his lectures: "When a sun calls forth a whole great Spring, fruitless a Summer, and ripens a harvest in which a united people have part, then the main thing to be considered is not by what near clouds surrounded the great star day by day climbed the heavens and finished its course. There might have been other clouds; there need have been none."

FEW COLLEGIANS BECOMING MINISTERS.

The Bowdoin College Orient has the following in reference to the large decrease in the number of college graduates who enter the ministry: "Turning to the triennial of our Alma Mater, we find this falling off particularly noticeable. The classes of the decade beginning with 1830 claim the largest number of clergymen, averaging 39 in every 100 graduates. In one class, that of 1833, out of a membership of 26, 15 graduated at theological seminaries. The next decade shows an average of 22 per cent., and the following of 18 per cent.; while during the last, (1860-69,) only one in 10 became clergymen. Similar statistics in regard to Harvard's Alumni, recently given in a Boston paper, are even more striking. In 1761-1770, 79 per cent. were ministers; in 1861-1870, 5¾ per cent. The same is true, though not in an equal degree, of all the older New-England colleges."

HORSE DISEASE.

The St. Albans (Vt.) Messenger of the 20th inst. says: "A curious horse distemper is prevailing at Windsor and vicinity, the animals suddenly losing the use of their hind legs, which is followed by inflammation and swelling upon the back."

The Boston Advertiser of Wednesday says: "The spinal meningitis has become quite prevalent in this city recently. There are cases of it in many of the large stables. At Maynard's, at the West End, there are five sick horses, and at the horse-car stable at the end of the Beacon street line of the Metropolitan Railroad there are seven."

THE ELECTORAL BILL.

SECRETARY FISH TO GEN. JOHN A. DIX.

INTENT OF THE CONSTITUTION, AND ITS INTERPRETATION BY ITS FRAMERS—THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE EMPOWERED TO OPEN AND COUNT THE VOTES—GRADUAL ENCROACHMENTS IN LATE YEARS UPON HIS POWER—ADVISABILITY OF THE COMMISSION UNDER EXISTING CIRCUMSTANCES.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23, 1877.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I have your letter of the 20th inst., and regret that we do not agree as to the bill reported by the Joint Committee of Congress, and when I find myself in this position or difference with you, I hesitate in order to review my own conclusions.

I cannot resist the belief that the intent of the Constitution was to give to the President of the Senate the counting, as well as the opening, of the votes of the Electoral College. It provides for the delivery to that officer of the returns, who shall, in the presence of the "Senate and House of Representatives open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." It is silent, it is true, as to who shall count the votes, but it is equally silent as to direction that the custodian into whose hands it committed the certificates, shall part with them, or allow any one but himself to count them. They are in his hands, and no person is to take them out; they are to be opened in the "presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," and the votes are then to be counted. By whom? Who but he in whose hands they are placed can claim powers under the Constitution to count what that Constitution has placed in his hands without authority to any other person, body, or power to receive or to take them from him to count?

This view of the power of the President of the Senate to count, as well as to receive and open, the votes for President, is, I think, sustained by the resolution of the convention which framed the Constitution, embodied in their report, dated Sept. 17, 1787, signed by Washington, as President of the convention, that after the ratification of the Constitution the Senators and Representatives should convene, and that the Senators should "appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President."

They did not contemplate that Congress, or either branch of it separately, should take any part in such count. A President of the Senate was to receive, open, and count the votes. Such was the understanding and such the recommendation of the framers of the Constitution. It is said to believe that those who framed that instrument knew what it meant, and it so chances that this very provision as to the person who is to count the votes is, perhaps, the only provision of that instrument to which its framers have given practical construction by deliberate resolution and by express recommendation.

The votes given in 1789 were opened and counted in strict obedience to the Constitution and to the recommendation of the convention which framed it.

There have been departures therefrom since then. Encroachments advance gradually, and are admitted inautiously when no practical ill or violent transgression or law or of right is flagrantly imminent, and each small encroachment or departure from the strict letter of a rule becomes a precedent for other and more important transgressions.

At each of the elections for President in 1793, 1797, and 1800, the then President of the Senate was a candidate for election; and there was no question of contested returns, and no question of the election of the person who was charged with the custody and opening of the certificates. Naturally, he would desire, and the two Houses unquestionably, in the absence of any practical pending question affecting the result, sympathized in such desire, to throw off from him and upon the two houses, in whose presence the votes were to be opened and counted, as much as could be of the responsibility and the delicacy of that his own election. The same has occurred on several subsequent occasions—in 1809, 1821, 1829, 1837.

The absence of controversy as to any particular returns, or of any possible question as to the result of the election, necessarily produced a laxity of observance of the strict letter and spirit of the Constitution, and admitted incipient questions whatever the practice of the earlier Presidents of the Senate conceded, in deference to the delicacy of their position as candidates to be declared elected by their own individual but constitutional count of the votes; and yet it must be remembered that Mr. Jefferson, in 1801, when his own election as President was involved, certified under his own hand that as President of the Senate he "did in the presence of said Senate and House of Representatives open all the certificates and count all the votes of the Electors for President."

Gradually, and with the continual aggression which Congressional power and prerogatives have been making upon the constitutional grants to others, this power of the President of the Senate came to be questioned.

In 1821, and again in 1837, questions arose as to the count of certain votes, which, on whatever side counted, or if not counted at all, would produce no change in the result of the election, and Congress adopted certain resolutions, harmless and ineffective as to the immediate question, but practically avoiding discussion and debate in the joint meeting to witness the count of the votes, and unfortunately imparting by implication a right which had not been before exercised.

With the last low years has been the first direct assertion of the right of a single house of Congress (or of both houses) to reject the returns of a State.

Power and right may be lost by gradual encroachments when not rebuked by the people. In a government of the people, vigilance, and resistance of the first and smallest encroachment, is the price of security. Unfortunately, the attention of the people seems, on the occasions referred to, to have been otherwise directed, and these encroachments were not rebuked.

The encroachment by Congress on the constitutional right of the President of the Senate to open and to count the votes has been gradual, but it is clear that it has become a practical usurpation, acquiesced in by the failure of remonstrance or of resistance.

And that this is not the only constitutional grant of power which has been invaded, it is necessary only to ask what is now practically the constitutional power of the President to appoint to office, against its practically usurped power by Senators and members of Congress, or what has become of the power of deliberation and of wise selection which the Constitution intended should be exercised by the Electors in the choice of the President, in view of the supreme dictation of partisan conventions. Both have yielded; some may say, have yielded to a wise and necessary popular tendency in our institutions; all must admit that they have yielded to a popular tendency. The fact, however, remains that in each case the theory of the Constitution has given way.

Under the precedents of late years it cannot be expected that the President of the Senate will be allowed to count the votes given at the late election. For different reasons, possibly, but without doubt as to the fact, a majority in each house denies his power, and he will not be allowed by himself to count and declare a result.

In the condition of the result, and with the peculiarity attending the returns from some of the States, and the political differences between the majorities of the two houses, it would be expecting more of human nature (at least of human political partisan nature) than a wise or thoughtful man will look for, to expect that the two houses will or can, with the passions which have been excited, and the large stake of the government of a nation depending on the result, be able within the time between the 4th of March and the day of the inauguration of the new President, to exhaust or to reconcile all the differences of opinion which must be given utterance, and reach an amicable conclusion. Appeals to violence and intimidation have already been made. Passions have been excited. The air is full of alarm and of apprehension. The conditions and the example of a neighboring Republic arises to the thought of thoughtful men.

What is our present condition? The industries of the country are depressed, business and trade in all their branches are stagnant. Values are diminished. Capital is idle and unproductive, and with it natural timidity and caution, fearful of investment, abstains from affording to the unemployed labor of the country the opportunity so beneficial to both capital and labor, for which each is anxious, but which is withheld mainly because of the doubt and fear of disturbance that may follow from a contested decision of the result of the election. The country wants peace, quiet and harmony between all its sections. It wants a cessation of the political acerbites which arose from not yet remote excitements and passions, but which now ought to subside and to be put aside with the events which gave rise to them. It is ready to avail itself of the assurance that the Presidential election will be decided, without resistance from the supporters of the disappointed candidate; and, if we can only give it the further assurance of a return to constitutional sound, hard money currency, a career of prosperity and of contentedness will be opened to which we have long been strangers.

It is in this direction that I look with hope to the bill that has been reported by the joint committee.

It is true that it does not reclaim the long-lost constitutional right of the Senate to count the votes, but I do not see that it violates any other right.

In the very nature of things, and in the divided political tendencies of the two bodies which alone can afford a relief from the dead-lock in which the result of the election has been thrown, there must be both to secure its creation, and to insure acquiescence in its decisions as nearly as may be an equal distribution of political views, in any body selected to and to afford the relief, which cannot be afforded directly by the two houses. It would be unjust to assume in advance that those who may be selected to serve on the Commission, although chosen as representatives of a party in Congress, are to ignore all facts and to close their eyes to all principles of the Constitution, of law, and equity, and are to report merely upon their party affinities. It is not impossible that some may do so, but not all, and it is to be expected that the character of the men to be selected will at least command for their judgments the confidence of something more than that of a blind, partisan, predetermined judgment. This must be accorded at least to the part of the Commission to be taken from the court.

The Commission proposed may, I think, be compared to what we used to know in New-York when we had a distinctive Equity Court as Master in Chancery—learned in the law, and honest in purpose. It is a Commission to examine the evidence and report the facts and the law, and upon their report Congress is to decide, giving to the report the important weight that it can be overruled only by the concurrent vote of both houses, avoiding the most dangerous assumption that either house may, by its own vote, reject the returns of a State.

In a normal condition of affairs, or as a rule for all time, I should not be inclined to favor the pending measure. I do not propose always to have what we think best, and possibly we may ourselves be mistaken in our conception of what would be best. Our Government is one of compromise; it rests in nearly every one of its principal features on compromise. It grew out of compromise, and it has escaped many a peril by compromise, sometimes even by the compromise of what may have been deemed important principles as distinguished from consideration of conflicting interests.

In the peril now threatening the country, in the fearful anxiety of every material interest of the country, in the cry coming up from all quarters for relief, for quiet, for the laying of the demon spirit of party violence, and for the opportunity of labor to find remunerative employment, and in the absence of any other better practical mode of escape from the difficulties of the occasion, I am compelled, and I regret herein to be obliged to differ with you, to accept and look with favor and with hope to the proposed bill. I hope and believe that the Commission, as proposed will report fairly, and without partisan bias, on the facts and the law. If it be otherwise, let it be against us rather than for us. We can afford to be defeated, but cannot afford to be in power with the suspicion of wrong upon our skirts or to secure the Presidency with a seriously questioned title to its right.

Much as I should lament that the power of the Government be entrusted for four years to the Democratic Party, I should prefer, if either party is to succeed with the taint of wrong or of fraud in its acquisition of power, that it should be the party to which I am opposed, rather than that which I support.

If either candidate be placed in power with a reasonable, well-grounded doubt as to his right to be there, his will be no enviable position, and the days of his party's supremacy will be numbered with those of his own occupancy of a position thus acquired.

Excuse, my dear General, this long letter. I could not, however, allow your letter to me to be unacknowledged, and on a question of the nature of that to which it referred, I could not allow a difference without attempting to give a reason for the faith that is in me. With great regard, very truly yours,

HAMILTON FISH.

In their report the Directors say that the fifty-sixth year of the existence of the institution has passed, and its prosperity and usefulness have experienced no diminution, and that they have great reason to be thankful that so large an amount of charitable work has been accomplished with so moderate an expenditure, and that its position as the largest institution of its kind in this country is still fully maintained. Since its foundation more than 205,000 poor sufferers from diseases of the eye, ear, and throat have received gratuitous treatment by its surgical staff, nearly 10,000 of whom were new patients during the year just closed. The statistical statement to the reports of the separate departments of the infirmary that accompany their report, in which are detailed the special diseases which have been under treatment, and the operations which have been performed by the surgeons. They urge that were the infirmary larger and its income greater the field of its usefulness might be largely increased. The report of the Treasurer shows that the disbursements have been kept, as heretofore, within the amount of receipts. During 1876 bequests were received from the estate of Mr. Thomas Barron of $5,000, and from the estate of Mr. Benjamin F. Wainwright of $1,000. Special donations were received from Mr. James Stokes, of $50, to provide spectacles for indigent patients; from Mrs. A. T. Stewart, of $2,000; from Mr. F. W. Meyer, of $100, and from Messrs. J. J. Astor, William C. Schermerhorn, J. B. Cornell, Rutherford Stuyvesant, J. D. Vermilye, and John Carey, jr., of $150 each, thereby constituting themselves Life Governors of the Infirmary. In conclusion the Directors confidently request the freest examination by a generous public of the claims of this institution upon their charity, believing, as they do, that in the entire City none more worthy of benevolent support can be presented for their consideration.

In the annual report of the surgeons of the institution, the number of patients treated during the year is as follows: Diseases of the eye, 6,660; of the ear, 2,410; of the nose and throat, 631; total, 9,701; number of operations performed during the year, 960; number of visits made during the year, 594. In their report the surgeons say that the public are apt to regard the City infirmaries merely as benevolent institutions, designed and maintained simply to relieve the indigent, and that of late much has been said of the danger to which all charitable institutions are exposed, of pauperizing the community by extending freely medical aid and succor to the poor. They feel that this reproach can not be justly applied to them in their department. The house patients are, many of them, men and women who have families dependent on them for support; loss of sight would entail misery to them and their households, and relief afforded such cases would restore means of support to the needy and tend directly to diminish pauperism. The surgeons especially ask the attention of the Board of Directors to the need that is felt at the infirmary for other accommodations, in which cases of a special character may be received. Very frequently patients come with inflammation of the eyelids of a dangerous nature, where great care and constant attention are absolutely necessary to prevent total loss of sight. These cases, unless one of the smaller wards is vacant, must now be refused admittance on account of the danger of infection to other patients already in the house. They also speak of the appropriation made with which to supply occasional destitute patients with spectacles, by which means they have been able to accomplish much good.

In the report of the Treasurer for the past year, the total amount of money received is $38,535 37; the total amount expended was $37,049 75, leaving a balance on hand of $1,485 62.

A TALK WITH MR. WHEELER.

A letter from Malone, N. Y., to the Boston Journal, written on the 19th inst., contains the following: "For the past 48 hours the citizens of this most enterprising and prosperous Northern New-York town and its vicinity have been jubilant over the latest decisions of the Joint Committee of Congress on the Presidential problem. This enthusiasm was more marked than it would have been in any other town save the home of Gov. Hayes, for the reason that Malone is the residence of Hon. William A. Wheeler, the next Vice President of the United States, whom the people of this vicinity have for years past considered one of the foremost men of the country.

The Journal representative this forenoon called upon Mr. Wheeler at his office in Masonic block. In the course of a few moments we reached in our conversation the recent action and decisions of the Joint Commission at Washington, and especially the Louisiana case. Mr. Wheeler seems perfectly satisfied that the decision was fair, just, and honorable regarding the Electoral votes from that State, and he thought for the Commission or any other tribunal to go behind the Returning Board's declarations would be inaugurating a bad precedent. Mr. Wheeler said: 'I was satisfied in November that Gov. Hayes was elected by the people. I was still more firm in my convictions when the Electoral Colleges met and confirmed it, and when a Commission chosen by the representatives of the Democratic party of the country confirm Gov. Hayes' election, I do not think anybody could have any doubt on the subject.' Mr. Wheeler is looking in the best of health and spirits. His office is plainly but comfortably furnished. He is always glad to meet friends and acquaintances, and to say the least, he receives quite a large number of calls from the hard-shell Democrats of this vicinity. Mr. Wheeler intends to leave for Washington the latter part of this week, and the citizens of his town are laboring zealously to give the next Vice President a cordial public congratulation upon his election to the Vice Presidency, previous to his departure."

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION, FEB. 23.

SENATE.

THE NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock, and, in accordance with the notice given yesterday, Mr. SARGENT, of California, called up the Naval Appropriation bill. Amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations were agreed to, as follows: Increasing the appropriation for the pay of the Navy from $6,250,000 to $7,270,000; appropriating $1,500 for the expenses of observing the transit of Mercury on the 6th of May, 1878; increasing the appropriation for the equipment of vessels, &c., from $700,000 to $970,000, and that for the contingent expenses of that bureau from $40,000 to $75,000; increasing the appropriation for repairs of the Naval Laboratory, Hospital, &c., from $10,000 to $25,000, and that for the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals from $25.000 to $35,000.

The House appropriated $1,500,000 for the preservation of vessels on the stocks, purchase of material, &c., and inserted a proviso that no proposal for materials to be furnished under this, or any other section of this act, shall discriminate against or in favor of the production of any State or section of the Union. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate reported an amendment to increase the appropriation from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000, and also to strike out the proviso inserted in the House bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, said this was a large increase of an appropriation, and he thought $2,000,000 was a larger amount than could be economically expended in a single fiscal year.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, in reply, said the proviso was put in this bill by mistake in the House. It was done at the suggestion of a Pennsylvania member, who had noticed an advertisement by the Revenue Marine Bureau for Tennessee iron, which was desired for a certain purpose. The Senate Committee on Appropriations thought it had better be left out. The Government, or any of its departments, should have the right to call for a particular class of material. As to the increase in the appropriation for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and also that for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, in the next paragraph, he had only to say that last year the amount for these bureaus was cut to a very small figure, probably to influence the Presidential election. During the past five or six years the Secretary of the Navy had been repairing our iron-clads instead of placing old wooden ships in order. All the single-turreted monitors were now in good condition; and two years ago work was commenced upon the five double-turreted ones, but last year the work upon them had to be suspended on account of the reduction in the appropriation. Prior to last year the annual appropriations for this purpose were $3,300,000. It was thought that the work upon these vessels would be completed this year, and we would then have the most complete system of iron-clads for harbor defense in the world. The great iron-clads of Europe were all stronger than ours; but they could not enter harbors.

It was also proposed by the committee to make a portion of this appropriation available immediately, that work upon the iron-clads might go on at once. The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Other amendments of the committee were agreed to as follows: Increasing the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam Engineering from $800,000 to $2,000,000; making $1,500,000 of the amount appropriated for the Bureau of Construction, and $

It is to be hoped that after the vote on the Oregon case we shall hear no more about the "partisanship" of the Republican members of the Electoral Commission. In this decision the partisanship is all on the Democratic side, and the law and the facts are obviously and indisputably with the Republicans. That the three Electoral votes of Oregon were legally cast for Hayes and Wheeler, is a conclusion whose justice the wayfaring man, though a fool, can appreciate, and it may safely be left with the people to judge of the impartiality of the seven Democrats who insisted that only two of these votes should be so counted. It was a very cheap display of virtue to refuse to recognize the vote of Cronin; it was a very discreditable display of partisanship to hold that the Grover conspiracy had succeeded in cheating the State out of one Electoral vote, and the country out of its choice for President.

If further proof were needed of the reckless and rancorous partisanship which pervades a large section of the Democratic Party, the proceedings of yesterday's caucus furnish more than enough. A motion to delay the resumption of the Electoral count in Joint Convention till Monday prevailed by a majority of 20 in a meeting numbering at least 110 members of the party. As objection will probably be made to the vote of Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, and as the double returns from South Carolina must go to the Commission, this action simply means an intention to render any choice for President impossible before the 4th of March. A number of Democrats opposed to delay absented themselves from the caucus, and 44 of those present voted in favor of proceeding with the work of the Joint Convention to-day. It remains to be seen whether enough Democrats can be induced to vote against adjournment till Monday to defeat the plans of the advocates of trickery and fraud, of which Tweed's lawyer is the very fitting leader. If the majority of the Democrats in the House are prepared to show themselves as destitute of the commonest requirements of good faith as they have already shown themselves to be destitute of the most ordinary political tact and forethought, they will have an excellent opportunity at to-day's session.

We publish in full a letter from Secretary Fish to Gen. Dix on the constitutional questions involved in the compromise bill for counting the Electoral votes. Some passages of that letter have found their way into print, and have been quoted by the Democratic press in a way calculated to give an erroneous idea of its general purport. Secretary Fish is quite emphatic in declaring that the true intent of the Constitution was to give to the President of the Senate the counting as well as the opening of the votes of the Electoral College. He holds that the convention did not contemplate that Congress, or either branch of it separately, should take any part in such count, and he points out that the provision on this point is, perhaps, the only one in the Constitution to which its framers have given practical construction by deliberate resolution and by express recommendation. In all this, and in his comments on the gradual encroachments made by Congress on the constitutional right of the President of the Senate, Mr. Fish is in perfect accord with the position consistently maintained by The Times. He differs from us only in accepting the Compromise bill as "the best attainable means of avoiding serious troubles," and in neglecting to take account of the disastrous effect, now only too apparent, of the working of the plan upon the moral weight of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The ingenious persons who took in hand the arrangements for an "industrial procession and carnival pageant" on the 4th of April have agreed to lay aside the masks usually worn in such displays, and so to bring their tomfoolery within the requirements of law. A carnival at the end instead of the beginning of Lent is a contradiction in terms, and a carnival pageant without masks will be a bald absurdity, instead of the grotesque one originally contemplated. In fact, there is a strong suspicion that the 800 wagons and 50 "floats" will be merely a procession of advertising vans, and, consequently, a piece of unmitigated humbug. The Police Commissioners would have shown some slight perception of their duty had they promptly prohibited so thoroughly inexcusable an invasion of the public thoroughfares to the great delay of traffic and detriment to buiness.

Mayor Ely has been unable to make up his mind about the Aldermanic resolutions requesting the Legislature to appropriate a million of dollars "to repair such streets as are in a dilapidated condition," and has accordingly returned it without either approval or disapproval. In dealing with this request, the Legislature would do well to bear in mind that, at the instance of Controller Green, the sum of $350,000 was inserted in the year's appropriations for the repair of down-town streets. This item was stricken out on the accession of Controller Kelly as dictator of the Board of Apportionment, in order to conceal the additions made to the salaries of Messrs. Dunlap, Boyd, Gale, and other Tammany Hall magnates quartered on the public Treasury. The down-town streets are very badly in want of repairs, and we have, fortunately, a Commissioner of Public Works to whom the direction of such an improvement can be safely intrusted. But the sum appropriated should not exceed a quarter of a million of dollars, and it ought not to be authorized till sweeping reductions in official salaries give some assurance that the City can afford the expense.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

It would be folly to deny that serious complications may yet arise in connection with the Presidency. The moral presumption is the other way. What might have happened had events been left to take their ordinary constitutional course the promoters of the Electoral Commission did not fail to portray. There was undoubtedly a chance of civil conflict as a result of an attempt by the Democratic majority in the House to exercise a power not warranted by the circumstances. The end of such an attempt did not admit of dispute. The country would have rallied to the support of a President whose title rested upon a legal interpretation which usage sanctioned, and the Democratic malcontents would have been compelled to surrender, humiliated and disgraced. The possibility of a contingency pregnant with strife, if not with civil war, reconciled the people to the Commission, and formed the most cogent argument in its behalf. Now, however, we are confronted with the fact that, after all, the work of the Commission may not be perfected. In the natural order of things, there could be no difficulty. The real labor is already over. The essential points in the controversy have been disposed of, and if the House were as prompt to finish what the Commission has begun as the Commission itself has been in the performance of its duties, to-day would have witnessed the final announcement of Gov. Hayes' election. But the House is actuated by a different purpose. At every stage since the Commission decided adversely to the Democrats, the House has interposed delay. It does not desire to have the election ended. And it is, unfortunately, able, by the adoption of dilatory tactics, to prevent the completion of the count within the period prescribed by law.

The methods by which this object may be effected are all discreditable. They are tricks to produce delay. Whether they take the form of motions for adjournment in the House, or of objections to the reception of votes before the Commission, they are wholly factious. The postponement of action in the House is with the view of accomplishing indirectly what the members engaged in it are afraid to try to do in an open way; and the presentation of objections to votes about whose validity no sane man has a doubt admits only of the same explanation. Both features of the plan are worthy of the disreputable lawyer who has been chosen to find pretexts for fraud and to excuse base partisan tactics by a parade of technicalities. The undetermined question is, whether any considerable number of members will perform the work assigned to them by Mr. Field in the House, and whether the Democratic managers before the Commission will give effect to suggestions that are more applicable to the defense of Tammany thieves than to the settlement of a Presidential contest. One thing is certain: Mr. Field and the reckless partisans who are prepared to do his bidding have an ally in the Speaker's chair whose conduct has demonstrated his willingness to pervert to unworthy ends the power with which he is invested. With an honorable man as Speaker there might be little room for fear. Mr. Randall is as exempt from honorable restraints as Mr. Field himself, and is quite as indifferent to consequences. There is, therefore, no inherent improbability in the threat that a portion of the Democratic majority in the House, guided by Field and abetted by Randall, will avail themselves of technical facilities for preventing the completion of the Electoral count before the 4th of March.

The infamy of the scheme is not a hindrance to its execution. The men concerned in it have no character to lose. They are not amenable to prudential party considerations or to the influences which the reputable members of their party may propose to use. They have, in truth, been allowed to go on without provoking from their associates more than a mild remonstrance. The decision of the first caucus was against them; the second caucus left the essence of the point in dispute untouched. It is only necessary to look at yesterday's vote on the postponement of the Oregon decision to perceive that the men of honor and principle in the party are a minority. The majority cannot make up their minds to accept in good faith the verdict of the tribunal they helped to create, because that verdict happens to be against them. As long as the majority thus hesitate between duty and faction, they play into the hands of the Field-Randall group, and encourage them to push forward their revolutionary plan. A party which, as a party, initiates a policy of causeless delay forfeits the right to rebuke those of its members who resolve that the policy shall be persisted in until it leave the country without a President. If the conclusion of the Electoral count be not reached in season, the Democratic Party must bear the responsibility of the crisis which will then be inevitable, and of all its disastrous consequences.

There will be one consequence which cannot be considered disastrous. The party which undertakes to frustrate the formally declared election of a President, and to plunge the country afresh into the turmoil and excitement of a contest made doubly fierce by the circumstances in which it occurs, will precipitate its own destruction. Yesterday's decision of the Commission is conclusive as to Gov. Hayes' title. It gives to him the requisite 185 votes. So much is authoritatively settled. The country accepts the decision as one by which it will abide, without waiting to consult the wishes of the defeated candidate or the pleasure of his creatures in Congress. Should these succeed in their tactics, the spectacle will be presented of the Presidency kept vacant by a Democratic refusal to comply with the requirements of the law in perfecting the title to its occupancy. A faction will defeat the will of the people as interpreted by the tribunal which all parties bound themselves to sustain and respect. The folly of the proceeding is on a level with its wickedness.

Even the destruction of the Democratic Party, however, would not compensate for the losses and injuries inseparable from a fresh election. In its ordinary course, and unincumbered by extraneous conditions, a Presidential election is not beneficial to business. It produces depression and doubt. Such a trial, under existing circumstances, would be exceptionally disastrous. It would be bitter beyond all precedent, and it would be clouded with misgivings from which every interest must suffer. The Republic would encounter an ordeal more severe while it endured than even the rebellion. We are not prepared to believe that a trial thus fraught with mischief and danger will be forced upon the country; but we are persuaded that it can only be averted, if at all, by the immediate interposition of the popular will. The crisis is imminent, and the Democrats in Congress must be taught that its penalties will fall first upon themselves. The business classes of the large cities prayed for the enactment of the bill creating the Commission; now let them tell Congress that the decision of the Commission shall be respected. There is no time to be lost. Within a week the election must be perfected or the country will be on the verge of political chaos. An expression of public opinion is needed to bring the conspirators to their senses; and to be of any avail it must be immediate and emphatic.

TILDEN'S DESIGNING FRIENDS.

Early in the Presidential campaign the Sun, commenting on the Democratic part of it, said that it was Mr. Tilden's misfortune to be chiefly surrounded by nincompoops. This sharp thrust at the Tilden management did not have any perceptible effect on the Great Reformer. He continued to be surrounded by the "nincompoops" down to the day after election. And when the period of uncertainty which followed the election began, the same motley crew went into the second contest with renewed zest. It would appear, however, that Mr. Tilden has at last seen how good a thing it is to have nincompoops, or, indeed, partners upon whom he can lay the burden of sins imputed to him. In his letter concerning an investigation of his bank accounts, he declares for himself. He will not indorse the doings of the men who have served him. Having secured all that their bargains could secure for him, he keeps the goods and repudiates the agents.

Looking back over the campaign, one can see how the guileless Tilden has been continually led into temptation by bad advisers around him. His enemies were those of his own household; those who conspired against his peace of mind sat at table with him. Hewitt, now disrespectfully referred to by the gifted Watterson as "a bobolink," while he fell on the Governor's neck and cried "My brother, my brother!" struck him under the fifth rib and destroyed his conscience. Patrick, confidential agent of Tilden, went to Oregon to look after matters in the Electoral College, and not only seduced Senator Kelly into indorsing a game which he did not understand, but actually imposed himself on Tilden with a series of cipher dispatches. Then there was Pelton, nephew and nearest representative of the Democratic candidate, who not only carried on a guilty intrigue in his uncle's house, but who contrived to make the world believe that his venerable relative was the chief intriguer. When the Democratic House went into the wholesale business of investigation, Mr. Tilden's bank accounts were found to be as legitimate subject of inquiry as those of anybody else. The accounts of the Republican managers had been submitted to the benignant examination of David Dudley Field, and nothing suggestive of irregular transactions was found. It is to be presumed that the bad men who had been personifying Tilden to his everlasting disgrace had in some way bedeviled his accounts. They had undoubtedly managed to trick him into drawing checks which meant nothing, but which would have a bad look. It is even said that some of those "nincompoops" and "bobolinks" induced the poor old man to draw checks, the dates and amounts of which were made to fit exactly into their nefarious Oregon transactions. Of course, the most natural thing for the simple-minded old gentleman to have done under the circumstances, was freely to admit his accounts to examination, and then charge all doubtful items to the malicious conspiracy of his friends and advisers.

The much-injured Tilden knew a trick worth two of that. He waited until the designing men who had induced him to put money in Oregon, or to appear to put money there, had again betrayed him. These false friends went to the Republican managers and offered to call things square. If the Republicans would give up Tilden's accounts, in which were strange things, they —Field, Knott & Co.—would give up the Republicans' accounts, which had nothing especially interesting in them. Of course, it could not have been Mr. Tilden who had fought so persistently against giving the accounts up to Congress, in the first place. It must have been the bad men who wanted to trade for them when they were finally ready for examination. The Republicans, with that readiness to oblige their enemies which has always characterized their management in Congress, consented to the arrangement. Then, as soon as the documents were safe, the virtuous Tilden broke silence. He declared that he repudiated any agreement to suppress anything, that he was ready to testify, (though nobody in Congress had suggested that he be put on the stand,) and that he never, never authorized or knew of any expenditures in the Oregon contest. It was a fine burst of stage thunder. It was almost as good as the genuine article. The World read the letter and calmly remarked, "That settles it," and the sage of Springfield profoundly observed that Mr. Tilden had "lifted up his party." He did not add—"higher than a kite."

Tilden waited until everything was snugly under cover before he exploded. His wicked friends had fought against giving up his accounts; they fought for the surrender of them after they were given up, and they got them back again. Then it was that this long-imposed-upon, much-enduring, and truly good man burst upon us with the information that there was nothing wrong in the documents, and that he utterly repudiated the bargain by which he had got them safely back again. Will Mr. David Dudley Field, "bobolink" Hewitt, and the rest be publicly denounced as repudiated, and say nothing? Mr. Tilden says he throws over the bargain. Will he also throw over the bargainers? We do not see but virtue is its own reward in this case. The wicked partners have secured all the odium. Mr. Tilden is the only man that has gained anything. He at least has escaped the exposure which was threatened him. It was a narrow escape for him when Pelton attempted to convince people that his uncle was conspiring with Patrick and using a cipher to disguise an infamous scheme. If Tilden had not pleaded "the baby act," most men would have believed that a member of his own family could not conduct a second Presidential campaign without his knowing its details. But the Great Reformer thinks he has wriggled out of that. He solemnly assures us that he "knew no more about it than a child unborn." Mr. Tilden has the profound sympathy of every tender-hearted person. Never was an innocent old man so put upon by designing friends.

THE TWO COMBATANTS.

As the prospect of a struggle between Russia and Turkey becomes more a probability, it is interesting to note the different capacity of each for a long war. In the Crimean War the Russians suffered from their weakness on the sea, as compared with the Turks and English combined. They could not support their advancing columns from the Danube by a fleet on the Black Sea. In the campaign of 1828-9, on the other hand, they were enabled to take Varna with the aid of their naval force, and could then cross the Balkans, having their wing supported and supplies furnished by a fleet. It is true that Turkey in Europe is so fertile a country that, in the proper season, it can almost feed an army, but for ammunition and many kinds of supplies, where the roads are so bad, a water communication is extremely valuable. If a campaign be indeed commenced during the coming Spring, Russia, in all probability, will have no assistance from the sea. If she does, it will only be after a tremendous struggle with a superior naval force. The Treaty of Paris seemed to have cut off the growth of Russian naval power on the Black Sea. But secretly the Czar was, under one pretense or other, constantly adding to the number of his vessels there, and at length, by an open announcement, he set forth to the world his determination to disregard the treaty and build up such a fleet as might please him. Still the result of the war had seriously crippled the Russian naval power, while it had given the Turks time and a motive to increase theirs. At present Turkey can boast of a powerful fleet upon the sea, consisting of 30 "cuirassed" vessels, 76 more or less iron-clad, carrying 463 guns, with 15,188 tons, and a force upon them of 28,995 persons. The cannon are, very many, of improved patterns, bought of European and American manufacturers.

Russia, on the other hand, has only two ships and one building, with two guns each, which we suppose to be monitors, 2 more or less iron-clad, with 31,336 tons, and carrying only 81 guns, with a force manning them much smaller than the Turkish. The apparent inferiority, however, of the Russian fleet may be compensated by its quality. A few first-class monitors might defy a fleet of iron-sheathed frigates. It is plain that a struggle will occur on the sea, quite equal in intensity to that waged on the land. If we consider the outside help to be expected by each combatant, Russia has clearly the advantage. From Servia she will get all that that exhausted principality can offer, but this will not be a large force, after the disastrous campaign just finished, probably not more than 9,000 men, who are not well drilled, and are discouraged by past defeat. The two principalities which were united into one princedom of Roumania can furnish a considerable army, fairly drilled by the Hohenzollern Prince who commands them, and perhaps amounting to 80,000 men. This will, in all probability, be ultimately put in the service of the Czar. Bulgaria, too, could furnish a considerable force, but the country has been so wasted and oppressed, and the peasants are of such submissive nature, that only a few thousand can be expected from them.

The insurgent provinces, Herzegovina and Bosnia, will also offer a small and embittered body of men, who are ready to fight to the death with their old enemy. The best auxiliary force for the Muscovites will be from the bold mountaineers of Montenegro, who can send into battle some 10,000 men and youth that have seldom been defeated. But these operate in wild mountains, at a distance from the lines of Russian advance, and can only make a diversion in their favor. The Greek population in Thrace, Epirus, and that region will also, no doubt, rise, but their numbers are not formidable, while Greece herself will very probably be drawn into the fray. But this little Kingdom, though heroically voting levies of 200,000 men, can really only furnish some 10,000 or 15,000, and will not count for much in the great struggle. Turkey herself can expect no outside allies, (for the Egyptian contingent belongs to the Empire,) the possibility of any help from the Mohammedans of Asia being exceedingly remote. Whatever feeling there may be among the Mohammedans of Croatia, there will be no possibility of their taking part in the war. Some few bands of wild Asiatic cavalry may, indeed, join the Ottoman Army, but they will be of little account. Turkey must fight out her battle alone. It is not credible that, with the friendly relations of Germany to Russia, and under the present financial condition of Austro-Hungary, the Austrian Empire would intervene in favor of the Turks. Should she do so, the struggle would take gigantic dimensions, but of this there is little chance. Russia, with her few allies and her comparatively feeble fleet, must wage battle with Turkey alone, and her powerful fleet. Russia, of course, has the greatest power and the largest capacity of endurance, and with her are the passions of many oppressed tribes, and a numerous race. But Turkey has the advantage of position, the desperation of a last struggle, and a certain genius for defense. What the issue will be, he would be a bold prophet who would predict.

SOME CITY SALARIES.

The second of the "long talks" on Municipal reform, held on Tuesday last, at Albany, before the legislative Committees on Cities, shows that the recipients of City salaries are all of a mind akin to that of the typical Maine candidate in the days of Neal Dow and prohibition, who expressed himself as emphatically "in favor of the law, but agin its execution." The heads of departments are all in favor of retrenchment, but they hedge their opinion as to its application with so many "buts" and other qualifying words, that nothing comes of the conferences except a gradual improvement in the knowledge of the burdens borne. The song is "retrenchment," but the chorus by the whole company is, "anywhere but here." So the retrenchment which waits for initiation and direction by the City employes will wait indefinitely, but meanwhile the salaries, so far as we know, keep placidly running along just the same.

In an article on this subject last Tuesday, the total salary account, as given from the estimates for 1877, differs somewhat from the total as given in the employes' list in the official journal of Jan. 31. By the former it is $9,706,843, and by the latter $8,743,731; the public school teachers are not given in the schedule at all, but the estimate for all salaries in and under the Board of Education is $2,700,000, and by deducting the $106,434 paid the 41 employes named in the schedule, $2,593,516 remains as estimated for the teachers. Adding that, the total is $11,337,247, which is as nearly a complete statement as we can make of the total of the exclusively salary burden borne by the tax-payers, and covers no other form of expenditure whatever. If erroneous at all, it is not on the side of excess. This is the figure for the public to contemplate, and it is the total which the heads of departments can see no way of reducing, notwithstanding their aching desire for retrenchment.

Controller Kelly, at the legislative conference on Tuesday last, spoke first of the assessments unpaid, saying that he thinks not more than seven of the twenty-two millions will ever be collected. Three months ago, Mr. Green stated the assessments at $22,258,881, estimated worth $13,000,000; the unpaid taxes of 1876 as $15,435,045, with $6,889,837 real, and $10,853,972 personal taxes of earlier date in arrears, $7,038,483 included in the last-named item being prior to 1871, and presumably worthless; of the total, $33,178,695, of uncollected taxes, he estimated $20,000,000 as the probable yield. Assessments are always resisted, and there are now pending several thousand actions against the City intended in some manner to evade them; their collection is always difficult—and that it is so is the clearest proof of the viciousness of the whole system of improvements to be repaid by them. But we would not go so far as to pronounce the collection impossible, as Mr. Kelly does. Simply because it would be putting the matter in a more truthful representation, we should favor his recommendation to transfer fifteen million dollars of the assessment bonds to the permanent debt, except that such a step would probably be a practical, if not a formal and legal, abandonment of attempts to collect. Who they are that pay their assessments, who they are that do not, and why they are suffered not to, are points upon which no light has been cast.

Subject only to the objection just suggested, Mr. Kelly's advice to fund the assessment bonds nearly due is worth considering. By the schedule at the end of June last—sufficiently recent for the purpose—there are $1,758,900 bonds of that class at 6 per cent. maturing daring this year and next, and $6,078,900 at 7 per cent. If the debt represented by them is to stand, refunding them at 5 per cent. would save $139,167 in interest yearly, and avoid the objectionable plan of continually making short loans to replace short loans.

But cannot we assist Mr. Kelly and the rest in finding spots fit for retrenchment? Starting at the beginning of the schedule, we find 21 Aldermen at $4,000 each, well paid at half that for all the labor they perform, not considering its value at all, with a President at $5,000; this is $2,000 too much, for if Mr. President Purroy's salary were less the expenses of election, which he pleaded as a reason for the large salary, might be lessened. There is a Clerk, of course, and his $5,000 should be one-half less. There are five assistants to do his work, costing $7,400; two engrossing clerks, at $1,000 each; a librarian and assistant, at $1,000 each; a Sergeant at Arms, $1,200; two messengers and a doorkeeper, $2,900 for the three; 36 persons in all, at $103,500. Possibly these clerks are all able to read and write, but their duties cannot be so "engrossing" as to make them all necessary. Is there any reason for not putting the knife of retrenchment among these thirty-six persons except that it would make them cry out? In the Executive Department, the Mayor's office is first. Mr. Wickham declared his powers to be scarcely more than those of a clerk. As that view of the office is about correct under existing conditions, there can be no good reason for not cutting down the salary of $12,000 one half. There is a Secretary, who surely could not justly complain if his $4,800 were divided by two. The Chief Clerk could live and be well paid at less than $3,000; the four clerks who do the work at $4,000, should not be quite neglected by reformers. There are a messenger and two marshals, at $5,500. There is a Permit Bureau, with a Registrar at $2,350, an interpreter at $1,500, three clerks at $2,750, and six "inspectors" at $5,400—total, twenty-two persons, at $41,100, the Permit Bureau costing $12,000. Unquestionably, considerable sums are collected from individuals for "permits" of various sorts, but what becomes of the money is another question on which no light has been cast. The Legislative and Executive Departments, however, are very poor fields for retrenchment in comparison with the others, to which we shall in due course direct public attention.

AUXILIARY FAT MEN.

Mr. Chomel is an ingenious person who has devised a new method of propelling ships. The motive power which he proposes to use is furnished by the waves themselves. Scientific persons agree that there is an immense force developed by the motion of the waves, but they have been entirely unable to utilize it. Now, however, comes Mr. Chomel with a beautiful model and quantities of convincing drawings, which clearly demonstrate that the rolling motion communicated to a ship by the swell of the sea can be made to propel the vessel in any desired direction.

The machinery by which Mr. Chomel's model is to be propelled is of the simplest description. It consists merely of a swinging platform pivoted at the stem and stern posts of the vessel, and connected by a few simple cog-wheels with the shaft of a screw propeller. Every time the vessel rolls the swinging platform, in the effort to maintain its level, turns the propeller shaft. The more rapidly the vessel rolls the more swiftly will the screw revolve, and the greater will be the speed developed. Thus, without the expenditure of a ton of coal, or the labor of spreading a yard of canvas, Mr. Chomel's ship will roll across the Atlantic, and convert to its own profit the fiercest malice of the waves.

While no fault can be found with this invention, provided it is used only when the sea is in lively motion, it is obvious that it will be useless in a dead calm. If the vessel does not roll, the swinging platform will not move, and if the swinging platform does not move, the propeller will not revolve. Mr. Chomel's craft may shoot gayly by the fastest Cunarder in heavy weather, but in a July calm the slowest steamer will pass her as though she were a dock. How the inventor proposes to remedy this defect we are not told, but, of course, the resources of science will be sufficient to overcome so trifling an obstacle to the success of a meritorious invention. Were Mr. Chomel to build a vessel after the model of a water-tight copper cylinder, fitted in the interior with an endless series of steps up which the passengers could continually climb, she could defy calms as well as storms. Neither screw nor swinging platform would be needed, but the simple device which keeps the treadmill in motion would roll the cylinder over the sea. It is true that the passengers might become weary of the Sisyphian task of perpetually climbing the aquatic treadmill, and might occasionally clamor for air and other luxuries, but so long as they could be kept at work there is no doubt that the vessel would move.

There is, however, a much better plan than this; one, too, which utilizes a force almost as powerful as that of the waves, and hitherto as completely neglected. There is a vast quantity of fat men in the world, and it is painfully evident that they have no clear idea what they are placed here for. The fat man is a mystery to himself, and his vague gropings after his correct solution are shown by his practice of associating himself with other fat men in clubs, and performing herculean feats of public overeating. Professional observers have failed to interpret the true meaning of the fat men's clubs, and have carelessly assumed that they are organized merely to gratify an abnormal desire on the part of fat men to make themselves conspicuously ridiculous. In reality they are the outward expression of the fat man's vague feeling that he has a mission, and of his noble determination to prove that he was not made without a purpose.

Mathematicians have calculated that every fat man of the weight of 300 pounds contains 83½ units of work, which, if properly utilized, would be sufficientto raise 83½ pounds 83½ feet above the surface of the earth at the equator. Nevertheless, although these calculations are familiar to all engineers, no one has yet devised a way to utilize this vast amount of latent energy, and many of our ablest scientific minds have found that the fat man is an enormous mistake, and that he owes his origin to an occasional absence of mind, on the part of nature, who has gone on heaping together unnecessary quantities of material when manufacturing a man, and has thus produced a fat man in a purely unintentional way. Now that Mr. Chomel has utilized the wasted energy of the waves, it is time that fat men should also be turned to profit, and it is a remarkable coincidence that both waves and fat men can justify their existence by contributing to the perfection of Mr. Chomel's new vessel.

As has been shown, this vessel is propelled by the movement of its swinging platform. In rough weather the waves will furnish the requisite motion. In calm weather fat men can be used with the best results. The fat man is so constructed by beneficent Nature that he can roll to an enormous extent without sustaining any injury, or overheating his bearings by friction. If six fat men, averaging 300 pounds each, were to be placed on one side of Mr. Chomel's swinging platform, and allowed to roll gradually and regularly to the other side, the shifting of their weight would immediately depress the platform and cause an entire revolution of the screw. By rolling back to the other side, a like result would follow, and thus, even in the calmest weather, the vessel would be regularly and rapidly propelled. It is estimated that six fat men of the specified weight would thus develop the equivalent of no less than one thousand horse power, and were they to be encouraged with sharp boat-hooks, they would probably work up to fifteen hundred horse power. Of course they would only be needed in calm weather, and would be regarded merely as an auxiliary to the power of the waves. They are imperatively needed, however, to make Mr. Chomel's invention a complete success, and there is no doubt that his "auxiliary fat-men wave-motor" will achieve far greater results than those which will be accomplished by the Keely motor.

The new invention will be hailed with the utmost joy by the fat men. Henceforth life is no longer for them a fat and foolish mockery. They now know that they were not made in vain. It was ages before men discovered how to loose the imprisoned energy of coal and train it for their service. Five centuries more were needed before the promise and potency of fat men were fully comprehended. The day has at last dawned when the fat man takes his place among the great sources of mechanical energy, and renders it unnecessary for us to dread the future exhaustion of our coal mines.

THE FUTURE OF NEW-YORK.

LETTER V.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

That many have been ruined by the decline in the value of unimproved real estate is true, but the conditions were peculiar. An era of speculation in property, during which prices perfectly fabulous were current, has resulted in a collapse which has wrecked vast nominal fortunes. For several years property in the upper part of the City advanced so rapidly in price that it is hardly exaggeration to say that a man might, with his eyes closed, put his finger upon a map of that part of the City above Fiftieth street, purchase the property thus blindly indicated at the owner's valuation, and in a few months it could be sold at a profit. It was a lottery in which every ticket drew a prize. Men, many of them of the soundest judgment, were carried away by the brilliancy of the bubble. Not many expected to hold permanently, and few expected to build. It was a passion, a contagious fever. The boldest operator was the most successful one. A large part of the transactions were upon margins, as they would be called in speculations of another character. Some cash was paid and a large mortgage given. The crisis of 1873 came; there was a pause. It became difficult to realize the cost of property. Large estates were offered at auction. The staggering market fell, struck down by the hammer of the auctioneer. The day of reckoning came, mortgages were foreclosed, and men who had acquired fortunes in other pursuits, but had staked their all upon the hope, which they had deemed certainty, of advancing prices, found themselves ruined. No one can withhold from the sufferers by the revulsion a sentiment of sympathy.

The City was, to some extent, a partner in these transactions. Stimulated by the success of Central Park, other parks were projected and the property secured at extravagant prices. Drives and avenues and boulevards of the most permanent and costly character were laid out and constructed. All the taxable property of the City was put under bonds to the extent of several millions of dollars to defray a portion of the expense of some of these stupendous undertakings, and there they stand to-day, monuments of corporate and individual extravagance, almost "as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean." The City's motto seemed to be, "Millions for ornament, but not a cent for utility," for during this very period the pavements in the lower and business portion of the City fell into a condition but little better than the streets of a Turkish village, impeding traffic and imposing burdens upon trade already overweighted in the contest with competing cities.

It is painful to make these statements; but they are true, and, as intimated in the first of these letters, it is a time for plain talk. It is time to strike a balance, to take an account of stock, to review the past, and address and adjust ourselves to the future with what faith and hope we may.

While upon unimproved, and, of course, unproductive property, taxation was onerous, assessments for improvements were crushing, and have, in districts of considerable extent, not only reached, but passed, the verge of confiscation. Time affords a solvent for many difficulties, and the embarrassment of property thus situated must probably for the present be remanded to await the development of methods of relief through the subduing agencies of time.

Not the least of the evils attending the condition of things herein described is that so large an area has been either placed in a condition where it is likely to be kept out of market for years or enhanced so greatly in cost as to unfit it for residences of the cheaper grade, so essential for the accommodation of families of moderate means constituting that middle class before referred to. This state of things has been the cause of the migration of many thousands of those who should have remained our citizens to Long Island and New-Jersey, and emphasizes the demand for methods of transit which must be safe and cheap, so as to reach the lower-priced lands in the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards. If it were not for the fact that the energies of the City were fettered by the bonds of a crushing debt, Municipal aid for an effective method of utilizing the vacant territory in the annexed district would be a fair subject of consideration. But it may be questioned whether the City is not in the condition of a man who by his extravagance has incurred debts which form a lien upon his estate of such gravity as, for a time at least, to hinder his improving his property in a direction almost indispensable, and compel him to practice an unused and inconvenient economy, to the absolute detriment of his estate.

It was not until after 1837 that the taxes of this City regularly exceeded 50 cents on the $100. In 1846 they began to exceed $1 on the $100, and since 1863 they have regularly exceeded $2 on the $100. Since 1863 the State tax alone has greatly exceeded, every year, upon each $100 of valuation, the rate of the City tax prior to 1837. The tax-payer, in looking over the musty records of the past, is apt to forget how meagre were the returns he received for his taxes 40 and 50 years ago. It was the old story of "poor pay, poor preach." Then he bought his spring water from a cart; he had no day Police, and a night-watch without discipline; his streets were in darkness when the moon was in the almanac; his fires were extinguished by water from cisterns or the rivers, through large syringes upon small wheels; his parks were the common lands; his schools taught the three R's; he swept the streets on certain days by his personal labor, and the ashes from his wood-fires were sold to collectors. In short, he did without many things he now has, and did many things for himself which others now do, or at least are paid to do, for him. It is unnecessary to detail them, but this changed condition costs—far more than it ought to, I admit. The luxuries unknown in former days—and we always think them better days—have now become necessaries, and the question can never be how to dispense with them, but how to enjoy them without a cost quite disproportioned to the cost of similar service, not only to private corporations and persons, but to other municipalities. This is the problem demanding present solution, so that this great City, relieved from hindrances, so far as may be in this direction, shall be the better fitted for the contest with aspiring rivals.

AFFAIRS IN ENGLAND.

POLITICAL AND GENERAL GOSSIP.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE LIBERALS IN PARLIAMENT—TWO FRESH ANECDOTES—PLACE FOR A POET—THE CHURCH AND STATE—AN IRISH BARRISTER AND THE CLAIMANT—THREATENED STRIKE OF COLLIERS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Tuesday, Feb. 6, 1877.

Fate and diplomacy have turned the kaleidoscope once more. After a series of comparatively peaceful pictures, chaos comes again, and through the darkness looms "grim-visag'd war." If the Eastern question is settled without a European conflagration, it will only come to pass as the result of the honest determination of the powers to keep the peace. But Germany has put her spoke into the revolving wheel of the kaleidoscope, and out shoots a mass of radiating complications that sets all the world gazing. I have already told you that Bismarck was keeping Gortschakoff in check, and the famous Minister's circular, which is coming to us in telegraphic shreds and patches, leaves Russia open to act exactly as she pleases. Turkey has refused the propositions of the powers; it is for the powers to say what they will do under the circumstances; it is for the powers to act or for Russia to take up her original position and act alone. It is thought that the powers will say they do not in any way feel aggrieved by the conduct of Turkey, and that they are anxious to give her time to carry out her reforms. Russia may or may not agree with their views. The Emperor personally, I am informed on the best authority, would favor it, and wait quietly the effect of the new Constitution, having regard more particularly to its action in ameliorating the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte. But the Czar is not altogether master of the situation, and just at the moment when bad counsels may be prevailing, the official German press throws in unexpected compliments and suggestions, which France believes, and with great show of reason, are the devilish doings of Bismarck, who sees advantages to Germany in war. The great German statesman's organs speak in the highest terms of the Russian troops, and intimate with Jesuitic slyness that the Porte has insulted the powers, and more particularly Russia, by rejecting their "terms of peace." To complete the latest kaleidoscopic change, we have news that Midhat Pasha, who won for Turkey all her recent diplomatic victories, has been dismissed—not only dismissed, but sent away out of Turkish territory. This indicates internal commotion in the Empire of a more serious character than anybody seems to have dreamed of. Midhat's successor is Edhem Pasha, a man of notable accomplishments, the same Pasha who had a row with Count Chandordy at the recent conference. The French press seem to regard Gortschakoff's circular as fairly pacific, but that is not the English view; neither is it the Turkish view. I have told you all along that the Turks would rather fight now, once for all, than to submit to the most trivial and even legitimate interference from outside, and I am borne out in this by the Turkish not which the powers have just received, in which the Ottoman Government emphatically claim the right to uphold the integrity of the Empire and to resist the interference of third parties in their internal affairs. Altogether, the news of yesterday and to-day is eminently unsatisfactory, and the war panic, lulled by the inaction of the past two weeks, will once more set in upon Europe, and perhaps at the last moment the Liberal programme settled for the opening of the British Parliament on Thursday may be changed.

It had been settled that no amendment would be moved on the address to the throne, and unless the news from the East during the next 48 hours should alter that decision, the Opposition will make no move in foreign politics until they have heard what Lord Salisbury has to say. The Queen will leave Osborne to-morrow and on her arrival in London will go to Buckingham Palace. The royal procession will leave there on Thursday to the houses of Parliament. Earl Beaconsfield, it is understood, put pressure on her Majesty that she should open Parliament in person and remain some time in London, and this is the only way to restore the Queen's waning popularity. Nevertheless, I am told at St. James' Palace that after the opening of Parliament the Queen will return for some little time to the Isle of Wight, but she will hold a series of levees in person during the season.

The session which opens on Thursday commences the fourth year of the Disraeli Government, and the Opposition fancy they see now the commencement of a strong reaction against the Conservative rule, but the ministerial power lies in the unity of the Conservative Party and the disorganization of the Liberals, and unless some untoward and unforeseen difficulties arise, the Conservatives will maintain their majority in the next session as they have in the past. It may be that they will encounter irritating sallies and surprises from the Opposition, but in any pitched battle of parties they are certain to hold their own. Should a European war intervene, the loyalty of the extremest men will prompt them to strengthen the hands of the Government. It has always been the case that in the midst of serious difficulties abroad, with a threatened war, or a war actually begun, no matter whether the Government of the time has been Tory or Whig, Conservative or Liberal, the Opposition has lent its aid to the Ministry in vindication of the national honor.

Mr. Lucy, the author of the World's "Under the Clock" articles, will commence his new series of papers in to-day's Mayfair. They will be called "On the Watch," and their attractiveness will be strengthened by thumbnail-pictures of "men and manners" taken on the spot.

Two mots, one in high life, the other in Bohemia. "Why is Cupid represented as a child?" asked Lady Gay. "Because love never attains to the age of experience" said the Duke. "O, but how many old men there are who are not proof against the gentle passion." "Quite so," said the Duke, "but they have fallen into second childhood." The other from Bohemia. "Why do you call your paper Truth," asked young Fitzmuggins. "Don't you like the title," Labouchere replied. "No, it would be more appropriate to call it The Liar." Fitzmuggins had felt the amiable Labouchere's sting. "Ah, I see," said the wily and court-like editor, unwilling to accept the rude affront, "The Lyre, and bring in 'music;' a very good idea, Fitz, I will think about it." Fitz thought about it afterward, and had to repeat the joke in the smoke-room of the Garrick before he would see the delicate wit of it.

Mr. Hallam Tennyson—named Hallam after the historian's son, in whose honor the poet wrote "In Memoriam"—will shortly publish a book of poems. He is said to have formed his style on the model of his father, and to have developed rare poetic talent. In addition to coming before the world as an author, Mr. Hallam Tennyson is on the eve of marriage with the only daughter of Mr. Frederic Locker, a versifier of some considerable note in society, which took him up because he was related to a Bishop. The Government is trying to find Mr. Locker an appointment. How good of the Government to put itself out of the way to add to the income of a poet! How much more kind when one remembers the relationship of the poet with the higher life of the episcopacy.

The Hatcham ritualist, Rev. Mr. Tooth, is still in jail for contempt of court, and his friends who have visited him there say he has much less comfort allowed to him than Col. Baker had at Newgate. At some of the highest of the high churches they offer up prayers for Mr. Tooth and appeal to God to deliver him from his "persecutors." Rather cool, considering that he is only in durance on account of his disobedience of the royal authority of the law. The truth is the ritualists recognize no law higher than the Church, in which respect, as in many others, they are in unison with Rome. It is on this ground that the ritualists as a body are favorable to the disestablishment of the Church, and the proceedings against Mr. Tooth will irritate this faction sufficiently to augment their vigor and importance. The Church Union is a society established to counteract the Liberation Society, which is an association of political Dissenters formed expressly to undermine the Church and bring about its separation from the State. A large body of the members of the Church Union are ritualists. It is looking, perhaps, far ahead to say that the Union and Liberation Society may one day find themselves working for a common object—the overthrow of the Church as it is at present established; but it is quite evident that the time is not far distant when the Church Union will cease to labor in the interest of the maintenance of Church and State. The ritualists believe they would flourish far and wide if the Church were disendowed, and that they would gradually build up the English Catholic Church into a great and glorious power. I should not be surprised to see during the next session of Parliament an attack upon the establishment which will shake it to its very foundations. A strong feeling in favor of placing the Church on the same level as the Irish Church is growing up in Scotland, and the Welsh offer the moral weight of a big compact body of liberators. For weal or woe, the ritualistic excitement now going on in London will push on the solution of the question of disestablishment, which has been the bone of contention upon English hustings for nearly half a century.

There is a new man in Parliament who is likely to be troublesome, and more especially as Mr. John Bright is cautioned by his medical advisers to be careful of his health, and not work too hard at St. Stephen's this year. I allude to Mr. Chamberlain, the new member of Parliament for Birmingham, who possesses the facility for talking as well as writing. He is a radical of the extreme type, and is as impulsive as he is fierce in his opinions. He made an attack upon Mr. Disraeli during his political canvass, for which he apologized in the papers after his election. His speeches upon the Licensing act have lately brought him into prominence, but he is not the author of "Essays by a Birmingham Manufacturer" in one of the newspapers. He is a secularist in education and a liberationist in regard to the Church; and while I write, as straws indicate the course of the stream, the latest telegraphic news records the resignation of a curate in Nottinghamshire who boldly proclaimed the principles of disestablishment at a public meeting and also in his pulpit. At the close of his sermon, however, his Vicar came forward and repudiated his subordinate's views, and in the midst of a scene of confusion the congregation left the church. Mr. Chamberlain, as Mr. Bright's colleague, will have an opportunity of demonstrating against the Church before the session is very old, unless the downfall of Midhat Pasha should really be the beginning of the end in Turkey, and then Parliament will even have its hands too full to attend to an agitator far more pretentious than Mr. Chamberlain, but without possessing any of that gentleman's recognized ability. Mr. John De Morgan, an Irish barrister, who obtained a certain notoriety in the recent Plumstead Common riots, has issued a manifesto—issued it in right royal form—issued it, and addressed it to her Majesty's First Lord of the Treasury. Who says England is not a free country? Mr. John De Morgan proclaims that unless the Claimant, believed by millions to be Sir Roger Tichborne, is released by March 1, he will gather from all parts of the Empire 100,000 men to march upon the House of Commons, and demand admission for himself and others to address the Speaker and the House, and show cause why her Majesty should, at the instance of the representatives of the House, revise and reverse the conviction of the claimant to the Tichborne estates! The First Lord of the Treasury has made no reply. Mr. De Morgan has made no more impression upon him than Mr. Boucicault did, though the famous comedian's letter was clever, and his Shaughraun threats far more startling than even De Morgan's 100,000 vagabonds. The new agitator hopes to be arrested and sent to jail to vie with Tooth and Skipwith, but it is hardly necessary to say that he will not be humored to that extent. From this latest manifesto, I imagine that the scheme for a Tichborne and small-pox demonstration on Thursday next following the royal procession to Westminster has been abandoned, and that Mr. De Morgan has been engaged by Skipwith and others to cover the failure with a new and a bigger threat—

"Beware the Ides of March."

It is 20 years since there was a general strike of miners in the great coal producing district of Durham, but a dispute is now going on which threatens to end in a repetition of that almost forgotten trade calamity. The difference between masters and men is somewhat complicated, but fined down, it is all a question of reduction of wages. Forty thousand men are banded together in standing by their solution of the difficulty. The wealth of the richest coal-owners in England stands on the other side. It is to be hoped that wise counsels will prevail. The men will be balloted by the trade-union deputies on the question of the final arbiter of a general strike, which would stop not only the great coal industry of the North, but effectually close the iron trade. The men will do well to consider a good deal before they strike just now, when the Winter is over and the demand for house coal in London is falling, and when some of the ironmasters would not consider it to be so very great a misfortune to be compelled to blow out some of their furnaces. The iron trade of the North is not so particularly brisk that a little rest would punish masters any more than it would punish the men.

SALE OF PAINTINGS.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, at noon, Feb. 27 and 28, there will be a sale of paintings by G. I. Banks, auctioneer, at Barker & Co.'s rooms, Nos. 47 and 49 Liberty-street. There are over 150 pictures in the catalogue, some of them by men whose names are well known. Cropsey has a view of Greenwood Lake late of a dark afternoon. The Autumn foliage he affects so much appears vividly only in a small clump of trees on the left. James M. Hart has a landscape and cattle; Casilear, a view on the Housatonic. There is a "Pet Parrot," by Bakalowics, of Paris, and a "Lake in the Catskills," by Whittredge. W. T. Richards, of Philadelphia, is represented by a coast scene near Atlantic City, and Edward Gay by a "Spring," showing fruit-trees in blossom. Arthur Quartley has several pictures of varying degrees of merit. That under No. 21—"On the Susquehanna"—is a very favorable specimen of his quality. John Thorpe has a good "Landscape with Cattle," and Gue, of Berlin, some landscapes of great merit, that remind one of Constable. The marines of Godchaux, under Nos. 1 and 2, are well worth examination. C. H. Shearer has a "Twilight" which shows good effects, and A. T. Bricher in "Providence Harbor" appears as hard as ever. There is a small "Apple Blossoms," by E. Lambinet, of Paris, and a "Flower Girl," by C. Gugel, of Munich, which reminds one of the flower and fruit girls painted by Mr. George Hall. There is likewise a bathing scene with nude figures, by C. Pollemburg, dated somewhere in the seventeenth century. The chief picture is one by Nechutny, who, it appears, has been knighted by the Emperor of Austria, has received the "Franz Joseph" order, and taken with this picture a high premium at the World's Fair in 1873. It is just the kind of historical painting to gain such marks of distinction for its author. The scene is the sparing of the besieged town of Nauenberg by a Hussite General, at the intercession of the children of the besieged. We can imagine Polonius in raptures over it. A number of engravings and watercolors will add interest to this sale.

FRANCISCO VICENTE AGUILERA.

Major Gen. Francisco Vicente Aguilera, ex-Vice President of the insurrectionary Government of Cuba, died yesterday afternoon of cancer in the throat, at his residence, in this City, No. 223 West Thirtieth-street. Gen. Aguilera was born in Bayamo, Cuba, on June 23, 1821, and was consequently in his 56th year. His father, Mr. Antonio Maria Aguilera, who was also of Cuban birth, held large estates in the vicinity of Bayamo, and in the Eastern District of Cuba, was at one time a Colonel in the Spanish Army, and while he held that rank served in the Peninsula during the war with with the French. Gen. Aguilera was educated in Santiago de Cuba and in Havana, and was graduated from the university in the latter city, receiving the degree of Bachelor of Laws. He then returned to his native place where he occupied himself in the management of the sugar estates, coffee plantations, and stock farms which he had inherited from his father. Shortly after his return to Bayamo he married Miss Anna Kindeler, granddaughter of Gen. Sebastian Kindeler, then Captain-General of the island of Cuba. Gen. Aguilera was always noted for the strength and decision of his character, and from an early age was known to be in favor of the separation of Cuba from Spain. He remained quietly in Bayamo, however, attending to the care of his large property, which was estimated to be worth more than $2,000,000, until 1867, at which time the Cuban revolution was inaugurated. He was the leader in the outbreak that occurred in Bayamo in that year, and was made Chief of the General Committee of three appointed to carry out the plans of the insurrectionists. The two other members of this committee were Messrs. Francisco Maceo and Pedro Figarelo. From that time until October, 1868, he continued in the work of organization intrusted to him, and after actual hostilities had commenced Carlos Manuel Cespides, chief of the insurrectionists, appointed Aguilera Major General in the Cuban Army. In April, 1869, the Republic was proclaimed and Cespides was elected President. He at once made Aguilera Minister of War, and he held that position until the following month, when he was elected Vice President of the Republic, by the Congress. In the same month he was appointed Commander in Chief of the Eastern District, and at once took command. While in command of the army he was distinguished for courage and ability, taking part in person in many engagements and skirmishes. He led the brilliant attack at Mayari in 1870, and was on the field during the whole of the seven days fight at Rio Abajo in the same year. In 1871 he was relieved of his command by Congress, as it was thought that he was peculiarly fitted to act as General Foreign Commissioner, to which position he was accordingly appointed. He then came to this City, and rendered important services to his country until 1873, when Mr. Mayorga was appointed in his place. When Mr. Mayorga took the position Gen. Aguilera was in Paris on official business, and when he came back to New-York he found that Mayorga, in his turn, had been superseded by Gen. Manuel Quesada, and Mr. Carlos del Castello, who had been made Foreign Confidential Agents of Cuba. Gen. Aguilera then acted with Mr. Aldama in getting up the well known expedition of the steamer Uruguay, and, later on, organized an expedition of which he was the leader, alone. This expedition sailed from Boston on April 27, 1875, on a brig, but after the party had been a few days at sea, a terrible storm came up and they were compelled to return. They made the Port of Newport, R. I., with their vessel so badly damaged that they were obliged to give up all hopes of making their voyage in her. He did not lose courage, but at once came back to New-York and organized another expedition, and on May 27, sailed from this port on a small sloop with about 14 men. This vessel left them within 15 miles of Cuba, in a small boat in which they succeeded in reaching Roman Key, on the coast. There they waited until night, and then attempted to reach the main land, intending to enter a deep creek or bayou and so pass the Spanish lines on the coast. Their guide made a mistake in landing, and instead of making the river entrance they ran into a Spanish encampment. A number of shots were fired at them, but they succeeded in concealing themselves in the dense growth of mangroves along the shores of the bay. In the morning they saw a Spanish gunboat that was on the lookout for them, and they remained concealed until the next night, when they managed to return unseen to Roman Key. There they stayed two days, but their sufferings on account of their having neither food nor water became so great that they determined to leave at all hazards. The next night they put to sea in their boat, and escaping the gun-boat, were taken up in an exhausted condition by a British wrecking steamer and were carried to Nassau, Island of New Providence, in the Bahamas. From Nassau Gen. Aguilera went to Kingston, Jamaica, from which port he sailed on another expedition, but was again compelled to return by another furious hurricane. He there refitted his vessel but there being two Spanish gun-boats lying in wait for him just outside the port, his officers begged him not to attempt to sail again, telling him that it would be suicidal to make another effort to depart. He therefore came back to New-York, and on April 22 sailed in a bark bound for Hayti on another expedition consisting of 28 persons, all of high position in Cuba. Failing to find the vessel which was to meet them he take them to Cuba they landed on Raccoon Key with their provisions and stores. After many trials and disappointments this expedition had to be abandoned also, and he again returned to this City. During all these journeyings his sufferings were intense, as he was not only debilitated by the disease which finally caused his death, but was horribly seasick the whole time he was at sea. His friends say that nothing but the most determined will and resolution enabled him to support the fatigue and hardships through which he passed. Gen. Aquilera leaves a widow and nine children, 8 of whom, except one, are in this City. Among the many Cuban gentlemen who called at his house yesterday, were Mr. J. F. Lamadrid, Mr. Plutarco Gonzales, Mr. J. M. De Varona, Mr. Nestor Ponce de Leon, Mr. Francisco Valdez Mendoza, Mr. Nestor Martinez, Mr. Leandro Rodriguez, Mr. Domingo Ferrar, Mr. Ramon Boza, Mr. Eladio Adan, Mr. Francisco Perez. The remains will be taken to the City Hall this afternoon or to-morrow morning, where they will lie in state until 9 A. M. on Monday, when they will be taken to the Roman Catholic Church of St. Francis Xavier, Sixteenth-street, between Fifth and Sixth-avenues, where the funeral ceremonies will be performed. The body will then be deposited in a vault until such time as it can be taken to Cuba. The following named gentlemen will act as pall bearers at the funeral: Gen. Martin T. McMahon, Gen. Charles K. Graham, Mr. Jose L. Ramirez, Mr. J. J. Govantes, Mr. J. Jo Polo, Mr. Plutarco Gonzales, Mr. Leandro Rodriguez and Mr. J. M. Macias.

PROFESSIONAL PIGEON-SHOOTERS.

SOME OF THEM CLAIM TO BE AMATEURS, BUT THEY ALL LIKE TO WIN MONEY—CONCLUSION OF THE TOURNAMENT AT PHILADELPHIA.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 23.—The pigeon-shooting tournament at Hunting Park, near this city, was concluded to-day, the same rules being observed as on yesterday, i. e. 21 yards rise, 80 yards boundary. There was little to note except the fine shooting of Miles Johnson, of New-Jersey, who killed 21 straight birds, and of Mr. Wood, who, with his score of yesterday, killed 20 straight. Slover killed 19. Johnson and Wood each killed 44 birds out of 50. The first and second prizes were consolidated and divided between them. Frank Kleinz, of Philadelphia, killed 43 out of 50, and thus won third money. Capt. Bogardus killed 42 and won fourth money, and John Lovatt and William Carson who killed 41 birds each, divided fifth money. Greenwood and Slover killed 40 each, and J. Jordan and Edwards, 39 each. On account of the darkness and their being no chance of winning, the following quit with the subjoined scores: Cornell, 38 out of 48; Eberhardt, 31 out of 44; C. Lovatt, 29 out of 40; Pearson, 29 out of 43; Turrell, 26 out of 42; Morton, 25 out of 43. The attendance was very small.

SALE OF A KANSAS RAILROAD.

LAWRENCE, Feb. 23.—The St. Louis, Lawrence and Western Railroad was sold to-day under the hammer, for $200,000, to Frank Morrison, of Boston, who acted in the interest of the mortgage bondholders. It is generally believed, however, that the power behind the throne is the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, which has been obliged to rent 17 miles of the road for some time past in order to get into Kansas City.

ARCTIC EXPLORATIONS.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—A petition at the Board of Trade rooms, requesting Congress to pass the bill appropriating $50,000 for the establishment of a colony northward in the Arctic regions, according to Capt. Howgate's plan, so that successful explorations may be attempted and the discovery of the North Pole attained, is being generally signed.

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

MISS ABBOTT IN OPERA.

Miss Abbott made her first appearance in opera at the Academy of Music last evening. An uncommonly large audience had been brought together by the occasion, and the reception of the débutante indicated that the spectators were as well-disposed as they were numerous. Enough was said about Miss Abbott, when she sang in concert, a week or so ago, to make a detailed reference to her voice and style superfluous. The impression of her performance, yesterday, was at least as good as that of her earlier efforts in the concert room, for she acts with a great deal of ease and vivacity, and the applause was just as generous. Yet, it would be advisable for Miss Abbott to once again challenge public opinion in a work more in accord with the taste of the day than "La Figlia." This pretty opera comique still holds its own in France, where brisk dialogue is listened to instead of the heavy recitatives which take its place in the Italian version, but it is seldom given elsewhere. On the stage of a spacious theatre like the Academy its effects, too, go for little or nothing, and the picture is literally dwarfed by the frame. Yesterday's performance lost somewhat of the pleasant influence an opera of more general interest would have bestowed upon it, and hence a suggestion that Miss Abbott should appear as promptly as possible in "Faust." Meanwhile, her Maria must be set down as a personation of rare sprightliness in a dramatic sense, and as quite as impressive, lyrically, as the opportunities accorded the primadonna allowed it to be. The "rataplan duet," with Sulpizio, and "Ciascun lo dice," were sung with infinite spirit, and in the duet "A voti cosi ardenti," with Tonio, Miss Abbott's delivery of the text was as expressive and as pointed as became the situation. The artist's thoroughly tasteful cantabile did full justice, naturally, to "Convien partir," and with this touching and melodious aria the first act terminated. In act the second, "I dreamed that I dwelt" and "Home, Sweet Home"—the latter being interpreted in acknowledgment of an encore—were part of the "music lesson," throughout which, by the way, Miss Abbott acted with much archness, and, in the third act, she rendered the martial and tuneful outburst with the requisite passion and force. As in the concert-room, Miss Abbott had the co-operation of Signori Brignoli and Forranti, and that of Mlle. De Gebele. Signor Brignoli has never been in better voice than just at present, and the impression of his clear enunciation and smooth delivery is as agreeable as it is rare. In the second act, Signor Brignoli sang the familiar romanza from "La Spia," by Arditi, and the plaudits were so unanimous and prolonged that he had to repeat it. Signor Ferranti was Sulpizio, and Mlle. de Gebele did all that was to be done with la Marchesa. To-day, "La Figlia" will be given for the second and last time.

THE OPERA BOUFFE.

"Girofié-Girofla" was given at the Eagle Theatre last evening. Mlle. Aimée did not show any traces of her recent illness in her representation of the twins. She assumed the dual character with her customary vivacity, and was efficiently supported by M. Raoult as Marasquin, by M. Duplan as Bolero, and by M. Reine as Mourzouk. Encores rewarded the couplets of Marasquin, the duets between Marasquin and Girofle, and the quintet which closes the first act. The drinking song was sung in Mlle. Aimée's best style, and the drunken verses in which Mourzouk and Marasquin have a contest over their wife were as effective as usual. The Grand Dukes Alexis and Constantine came in at the close of the first act and remained throughout the rest of the performance.

A NEW CANTATA.

A cantata called "Malchus," composed by Mr. F. T. S. Darley, was made known at Chickering Hall, last evening. The story is similar to that of Dr. Loewe's oratorio of "The Seven Sleepers," and it is illustrated by music of a mildly dramatic character. Mme. Gulagor, Mr. Simpson and Mr. Sohst were the principal soloists, last night; the New-York Choral Union sang the choruses, and the orchestra was under the baton of Mr. P. S. Gilmore.

AN OPERATIC SCANDAL.

The dispatch printed this morning in respect of an announcement by the Paris Figaro that Mme. Adelina Patti had eloped with the tenor Nicolini will not surprise persons au fait of transactions in the art world of Europe. The Paris Figaro is, indeed, poor authority on most subjects, but well-grounded stories were current months ago in London as to Mme. Patti's partiality for the distinguished artist whose name is now mentioned in connection with her own, and it was asserted that arrangements were then in progress by which each of the parties in the case might be freed from the matrimonial yoke and left to follow his and her inclination. A divorce was granted Mme. Nicolini against her husband in the Paris courts, a few weeks since, and we imagine that M. De Caux will be allowed to obtain one against Mme. De Caux as promptly as he may choose to do so. Signor Nicolini is about 30 years of age, a Frenchman by birth, and a gentleman and singer of uncommon culture. His nom de famille, we believe, is Nicolas.

INSURANCE MATTERS.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—In view of the fact that the outlook for insurance capital is so discouraging, some of the stockholders of the Shawmut Insurance Company have decided to call a meeting of stockholders to consider the expediency of going into liquidation.

ALBANY, Feb. 23.—Several months since, Florence S. Van Valkenburgh, as administratrix of her deceased husband, sued the American Popular Life Insurance Company to recover the amount of a policy of life insurance issued to him some time previous to his death. The jury gave her a verdict, and the company appealed to the General Term, which, at the last term, affirmed the judgment, amounting, with costs, to $3,250 56. From this decision the company to-day filed a notice of appeal to the Court of Appeals.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 23.—Judge Boyle, of the Circuit Court, to-day, granted a temporary injunction against the Columbia Life Insurance Company, restraining it from further prosecuting its business or disposing of any of its property or assets without consent of the court.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND THE DOMINION.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 23.—A dispatch from Victoria, British Columbia, states Parliament was opened yesterday by the Lieutenant Governor. A dispatch from Lord Carnarvon was laid before the house asking the Province to recognize the principle of a money equivalent for the Inland Railway and expressing belief that work on the main line will be opened in the Spring. The dispatch has the effect of quieting the separation sentiment. The Colonist is confident the anti-separationists are in the majority and anticipates no further trouble unless the railway contract is repudiated by Canada.

MARRIAGE OF AMERICANS IN JAPAN.

The Des Moines (Iowa) Register of the 21st inst. says: "Major J. R. Wasson and wife were yesterday registered at the Savery. They came directly from Japan here and are on their wedding journey. They were wedded in Japan but recently, the wife being a daughter of Hon. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, the United States Minister to Japan. Major Wasson's parents reside near Carlisle, and he yesterday visited the 'old folks at home.' He was appointed from this district to a cadetship at West Point, and a few years since graduated as No. 1 in a large class. Shortly after his graduation there was a call from Japan for engineers, and on account of his eminent fitness Major Wasson was sent to that country, where he has remained ever since, rapidly gaining the esteem of the officials of that nation, and he occupies one of the most prominent positions in the service of Japan, and is receiving a very large salary. The Major, with his accomplished wife, left by the midnight train for the East, where they will visit friends. He has been recently appointed to the office of paymaster in the United States Army, with the rank of Major, and will remain in this country."

THE CANAL SUITS.

ALBANY, Feb. 23.—In the Lord & Leahy Canal case, in which at the last General Term the decision of Justice Osborne dismissing the complaint was affirmed, judgment was entered up to-day in the County Clerk's Office by counsel for the defendants, Lord & Leahy. The amount of the judgments as entered, including the extra allowance granted by Justice Osborne, is $2,527 36. The Attorney General, it is said, intends carrying the case to the Court of Appeals.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE AND ST. PAUL.

MILWAUKEE, Feb. 23.—In the Assembly to-day, the bill to disfranchise the bondholders of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad was indefinitely postponed.

COME NOW and let us reason together. Why do people so frequently say to Dr. Pierce, "I suppose your GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY cures every thing?" Because it has been the practice of knavish charlatans to manufacture worthless nostrums and attempt to dupe the ignorant and credulous by recommending them to cure every form of disease. To such an extent has this been practiced that it is no wonder that many have acquired prejudices against all advertised remedies. But Dr. Pierce does not advertise his standard preparations as "cure alls," does not claim that they will perform miracles, but simply publishes the fact that they have been developed as specifics for certain forms of disease for which he recommends them, after having tested their efficacy in many hundred cases with the most gratifying success. It is a fact known to every well-informed physician that many single remedies possess several different properties. Quinine, for instance, has a tonic quality, which suggests its use in cases of debility; an anti-periodic, by which it is efficacious in ague; and a febrifuge property, which renders it efficacious in cases of fever. The result of its administration will also vary with the quantity given and the circumstances under which it is employed. So, likewise, the GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY possesses both pectoral and alterative, or blood-cleansing properties of the highest order. By reason of these two prominent properties it cures two classes of diseases. First, those of the respiratory organs, as throat, bronchial, and lung affections, chronic coughs and asthma, and second, diseases of the blood and glandular system, in which affections all skillful physicians employ alteratives, as in cases of blotches, eruptions, ulcers, swellings, tumors, abscesses, and in torpor of the liver or "biliousness." While its use is, by its combination of properties, suggested in cases of pulmonary consumption, yet you need not take it expecting it will cure you if your lungs are half consumed, nor because it is recommended as a blood medicine would its proprietor advise you to take it expecting it to cure cancer. It will not perform miracles, but it will cure many grave forms of diseases.—Advertisement.

WHEN your liver is out of order, use Dr. JAYNE'S SANATIVE PILLS, and you will bring back this organ to a healthy condition, and get rid of many distressing symptoms.—Advertisement.

FOREIGN MISCELLANY.

THE FRENCH POST OFFICE.

ITS ORIGIN—FLYING POSTMEN—ORDINARY POSTS AND ROYAL RELAYS—THE PRICE FOR LETTERS.

M. de Foville, continuing in the Economiste Français his researches into the variations of prices in France during the last half century, traces to its source the origin of the French Post Office from the time when Philippe-le-Bel and Louis X. issued charters confirming the privileges of the "Messengers," who acted as flying postmen between the students of the Paris University and their relatives. Louis XI., with a view of making the postal system a source of profit for the Royal Treasury, instituted throughout the Kingdom a certain number of "master couriers," who exercised functions very similar to those of the more modern Postmaster, and who were placed beneath the control of a Grand Master nominated by the Crown. At first these couriers were forbidden, under pain of death, to let horses to any private individual without the express permission of the King and of the Grand Master, "the King intending that the benefits of the said establishment should be reserved solely for himself." It is known by a communication which he made to the States-General of Burgundy that Louis XI., when resident at Plessis-lès-Tours, was aware of the death of Charles the Bold, killed upon the battle-field of Nancy, within three days, and the couriers must therefore have traveled at the rate of 90 miles a day, as the two places are more than 270 miles apart. Later in his reign Louis XI. allowed private individuals to make use of the post; but the tariff, equivalent to two shillings for 10 miles, was almost a prohibitive one. The profits derived from this source were applied to defraying the cost of the Artillery. When Charles VIII. came to the throne there were 200 relays of post-horses in France, and he improved the service so much that while on a visit to Rome he received, on the 12th of January, a letter written from Paris on the 15th December. Henry IV. augmented the number of Postmasters, and by an edict dated May 6, 1597, he ordered the "establishment of relays of post-horses upon the highways and cross-roads, and along the banks of rivers, for the conveyance of passengers, mails, and baggage of all kinds." Two "generals for the relay of post-horses" were appointed, and it was their duty to "adjudicate the contracts for farming the post," the contracts being made for terms of three and six years. Five years later another royal edict consolidated the ordinary posts and the royal relays, the latter of which were very injurious to the post, and the combined services were placed in the hands of a Controller General, who paid 30,600 crowns for the monopoly. In 1629 Cardinal de Richelieu ordered the Provincial Governors and other functionaries to forward their official correspondence by the ordinary post instead of by express, and to insure safe delivery every dispatch was registered in a book provided for the purpose. Soon afterward the same facility was accorded to individuals upon payment of an extra fee, and this was the origin of "registered letters." During the first part of Louis XIII.'s reign there were continual disputes going on between the postal officials and the senders of letters as to the price which ought to be paid, and in order to put an end to these misunderstandings Cardinal de Richelieu issued a decree giving the general tariff for the different parts of France. Thus, a letter from Paris to Lyons or Nantes was to cost three sols instead of four, and a letter from Paris to Languedoc or Provence, six sols instead of eight. In 1643 Louis XIII. abolished the privileges of the university messengers, and created three hereditary offices of "controllers," "weighers," and "taxing-masters" of letters and parcels, allowing them to charge as a remuneration for their work a fourth of the normal fee. In other words, he increased the rate of postage by 25 per cent. Louvois, who obtained for himself the title of Superintendent General of the Post, farmed out the Post Offices to M. Patin for the sum of £48,000 a year, and this system remained in force until the revolution, being abolished on the 13th of June, 1790. More than 23 contracts, nearly all of them higher than the preceding, were made during the 118 years between 1672 and 1790, and the sum of £48,000 paid by M. Patin in the first year, had grown to £480,000, or 10 times the amount, when the last contract was concluded in 1780. The price for letters varied very much, and in 1759 an ordinary letter cost five sols for a distance of 50 miles or under, and 15 sols for a distance of more than 4 and less than 500 miles. At this period, however, there was a fixed tariff of twopence for every sheet of printed matter, the only exception being in favor of the Gazette de France and Mercure, which could be sent for three halfpence. Five per cent. on the declared value was paid for the transmission of gold and silver through the post. It is from 1759, too, that dates the creation at Paris of what was long termed "La Petite Poste," for the attempt made by M. Velayer, Master of Requests, a century before, had been unsuccessful. His idea was taken up in the reign of Louis XV. by M. de Chamousset, and after it had been put into execution was so much approved of that Paris soon contained 395 letter-boxes and 117 postmen. A letter for the interior of Paris cost 2 sous, and for the suburbs three half-pence, prepayment in each case being compulsory. In 1771 the General Post Office possessed 3,000 relays of horses, 12,000 employes, and delivered 30,000,000 letters. M. De Foville proposes to study in a second article the still more marked changes which have taken place in the Post Office since the beginning of the present century, and he will have to record, among other things, that the 30,000,000 letters of 1771 have grown to 417,824,932 in 1875.

THE ROYAL STATE COACH.

The royal state coach in which Queen Victoria recently proceeded from her palace to the Houses of Parliament has just had a complete overhauling and been regilt. It was constructed in 1761. The builder was Sir Thomas Chambers, and the paintings were executed by Cipriani. It is richly ornamented with laurel and carved work, the whole being elaborately gilt. The length of the body is 24 feet; it is 8 feet 3 inches wide, and 12 feet high. Four large Tritons support the body by 4 braces, covered with red morocco leather, ornamented with gilt buckles. Of these two support the driver's seat in front of the carriage. They are represented in the act of drawing by cables extending round their shoulders, with cranes and sounding-shells to announce the approach of the Monarch of the Ocean. Two Tritons at the back carry the imperial fasces, topped with tridents. The driver's footboard is a large scallop shell ornamented with bunches of reeds and other marine plants. The pole represents a bundle of lances, the splinter-bar being composed of a rich molding issuing from beneath a volluted shell, the ends terminating in the head of a dolphin. The wheels are imitations of those of the ancient triumphal chariot. The body of the coach is composed of eight palm trees, which, branching out at the top, sustain the roof, and four angular trees are loaded with trophies allusive to the victories obtained by great Britain. These are supported by four lions' heads. On the centre of the roof stand the figures of three boys, representing the genii of England, Scotland, and Ireland, supporting the Imperial Crown of Great Britain, and holding in their hands the sceptre sword of State, and ensigns of knighthood. Their bodies are adorned with festoons of laurel, which fall thence toward the four corners. On the panels and doors are painted emblematical devices. The regilding and fitting up has just been effectively carried out under the superintendence of her Majesty's coach-builders, who have also supplied a new and improved set of harness for the eight cream-colored horses.

THE GREATEST SOLDIER OF THE AGE.

The Copenhagen correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette says: "The republication of the letters from Russia by Count Moltke in the Deutsche Rundschau, and the sensation which they seem to produce, induces me to send you the following particulars, which may not be without interest. The letters are authentic. They are written to a cousin of the Count, a lady belonging to the haute noblesse danoise, but whose name I am not allowed to publish, and were originally printed some eight years ago in the Copenhagen Dagens Nyheder, (The News of the Day,) whose then editor, Mr. Robert Watt, had somehow got hold of them. The letters contain very little of importance; their chief merit is that they now put in the renowned Field Marshal in the light of a clever writer of gossip. It was not generally known that Count Moltke was originally an officer in the Danish Army. At the age of 9 years he was entered as a 'Royal cadet'—i. e., he was to be educated at the expense of the King, (Frederick VI.) in the Copenhagen Military Academy; and, having taken his examinations, he wore the Danish uniform until, as sub-Lieutenant, at the age of 27 years, he petitioned the King for a three years' leave to proceed to the Continent to study the military art; as he says in his petition, 'to be able on his return to employ his acquirements for the good of his country.' This petition was granted, but the Count also asked to be allowed to retain his pay, and as the King refused this, he took his discharge and entered the Prussian Army. The refusal to pay perhaps a couple of hundred pounds may thus have been the means of altering the map of Europe."

LOOK OUT FOR HAT LININGS.

The London Medical Press and Circular says: "It would seem that that portion of humanity which enjoys the luxury of wearing clothes is imperiled at both extremeties by the tricks of competing tradesmen. Not long since we heard much of the risks of wearing pink stockings, which had been found to subject the owners to violent eruptions about the ankles, and to involve serious inconveniences, if not actual dangers. It was then discovered that the desagremens of the dandy-socked gentry arose from the use of analine in the pink dye. We now hear that the other end of our bodies corporate is threatened with the same infliction, from the same cause. A shoemaker in Stettin had bought a felt hat from a well-known firm. Soon after wearing it, though the hat exerted no pressure, headache set in, with frontal swelling, followed by a pustular eruption. The eyes also became so inflamed that they closed, and the swelling began to spread to the lower part of the face. It was evident that these symptoms were due to the wearing of the hat, and—the latter having been submitted to examination by a chemist—it was ascertained that the brown leather lining was colored with poisonous aniline. Let us hope that aniline hat linings will be made contraband, for an attack on our cranial is a far more serious matter than on our toes; and henceforth it is only those whose lining is on the outside of their heads that will patronize the attractive decorations of Stettin.

EGYPT AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A SQUADRON DISPATCHED BY THE KHEDIVE FOR ITS SUPPRESSION—THE HAREM SYSTEM—$150,000 PAID FOR TWO WOMEN.

The Alexandria correspondent of a London newspaper writes, Jan. 29, as follows: "As already telegraphed to you, the Khédive has determined to dispatch a squadron, under the command of M'Killop Pacha, to the Red Sea to aid in the supression of the slave trade. This step on the part of one who bears the reputation of being the greatest slave-owner in the world is in itself so remarkable, and the subject is one in which so much interest is felt in England, that further details may probably not be unacceptable. The force as at present arranged will consist of four steamers—the corvette Latif, the sloop Sinai, an unarmed vessel called the Negalileh, which is intended to be the flag ship, and another steamer now on her way from Berbera. In addition to their regular crews the vessels will embark a certain number of soldiers, together with a suitable staff of medical and commissariat officers. It may readily be surmised that, in the existing state of Egyptian finances, it has required more than usual pressure to induce his Highness to embark in this enterprise. That this should be so is natural enough when one comprehends the true position of affairs, and effects that even if successful it will most likely entail upon the Khédive a considerable loss of revenue, over and above the actual cost of the expedition. There is little or no doubt that much of the irregular income which the Moslem was able upon emergency to raise from sources referred to by Mr. Goschen as 'not specified,' really came either directly or indirectly from the slave trade; and the Khédive might well pause at the present crisis before adopting any measure tending to diminish the available resources of the country. No one acquainted with Egypt will be disposed to give the present Sovereign credit for any real anxiety to interfere with either slavery or the slave trade; and even were it otherwise there would be abundant scope for his Highness' philanthropic ambition within the limits of his own dominions.

"To say nothing of the forced labor system, which is itself only a form of slavery, it is notorious that at the present moment both slavery and the actual traffic in slaves exists in many parts of Egypt. At Siout, only 240 miles above Cairo, I know a man, a European, who bought slaves at 27 a piece less than two months ago. It is true that the slaves in question were procured for domestic service, and are still acting in that capacity; but, nevertheless, the fact remains that they are slaves to all intents and purposes, and were bought and sold in one of the principal towns in Egypt. It is well known that when Col. Gordon's officers captured gangs of slaves in the interior and sent them to the Mudir or Governor, that official frequently sold them again to the first dealer that came by, and alleged as an excuse the necessity of providing the amount of revenue demanded from his district. With reference to this subject it must not be forgotten that one considerable source of income is the 'backsheesh' paid to Government officials by the slave-dealers as the price of noninterference with them in the various routes through Egypt to the Red Sea.

"Of course, in a country under Mohammedan rule where the harem system is in operation slavery as a domestic institution will exist; and so far as one can judge from recent events, Egypt does not appear likely to prove an exception. Every one remembers how only a few weeks ago the saleable portion of the late Ismail Pacha's harem (estimated at 300 in number in white slaves alone) were 'brought to the hammer' in Cairo, and that, too, at the very time that the Khédive announced his intention of suppressing the slave trade in the Red Sea. His Highness' own example in such matters cannot be considered as altogether satisfactory, when one remembers the vast number of women and slaves that fill his harems and contribute to his financial embarrassments. I am credibly informed that for two female slaves alone, purchased at Constantinople from the chief eunuch to the Sultan, the Khédive paid no less than £30,000. Of course, they were the most beautiful of 'houris'—in fact, so much so as to have aroused the jealousy of the other inmates to an extent which at last compelled their proprietor to send them away. The mode usually adopted in such cases is to marry the lady, after providing her with a suitable dowry, to some favored courtier, who considers himself much honored by the distinction. This method of disposing of the superfluities of the Viceregal harem, though preferable to the old plan of sewing them up in sacks and throwing them into the Nile, does not unfortunately always insure the domestic happiness of the discarded favorite. In one case which came to my knowledge an officer in the Egyptian Army, who had been honored in the above way, on seeing his bride for the first time after the wedding found her so unattractive that he refused to live with her, and persisted in his determination, although warned of the displeasure he would incur in high quarters. The sequel to the story is equally instructive, and throws much light on Oriental habits and customs. The husband was appointed the 'wakil,' or deputy of the Governor of a town far away in the interior, and during the absence of his chief on a campaign, had occasion to open some of the documents among which were instructions to the effect that he was himself to be put out of the way, either by poisoned coffee or other means. The officer, as in duty bound, acknowledged the receipt of the letter intended for his superior, merely adding that during the latter's absence the request it contained could not be complied with without detriment to the public service, but that upon his return everything should be done as directed. In the meanwhile, I believe, the gentleman found it convenient to seek employment elsewhere.

"The particular part of the slave traffic to which McKillop Pacha's attention is to be directed is that which consists in the transport of negroes from the African to the Arabian shores of the Red Sea, and has, according to all accounts, reached formidable dimensions. At Jeddah, Yembo, and other places there are, it appears, regular periodical importations from the opposite shore, who come across in 'Arab dhows,' containing often as many as 500 or 600 at a time. After being landed the slaves are either sold privately in the market, or sent up to Medina where they command a good price. It is stated that many of the vessels thus employed fly the English flag, and thus escape detection. This, if true, will be an additional reason for the proposed joint action of the British and Egyptian vessels. Whether or not the traffic is connived at by Egyptian officials may be a matter of opinion, but that a large portion of the Khédive's subjects are engaged upon it is beyond a shadow of doubt."

THE DOCTRINE OF RACE.

THE TEST OF LANGUAGE—OUR FOREFATHERS—WHAT IS MEANT BY A NATION.

From the Saturday Review.

Language is no guide whatever to race, if by race is meant that kind of purity of blood which a lawyer would demand if a man were trying to make out his title to an estate or a peerage. For such a purpose he must make out every stage of his pedigree beyond doubt. National purity of blood of this kind is nowhere to be found; the thing is impossible. No people on earth ever kept themselves altogether from admixture with other people. If physical or legal purity of blood is needed to establish kindred of race, the task may be given up at once. On this showing every folk is a Mischvolk. Very few men are absolutely certain who their forefathers were a thousand years back; no man is absolutely certain who his forefathers were two thousand years back. It is perfectly true that many particular men, and even large classes of men, do not, in the way of physical and legal pedigree, belong to the races to which the mere test of language would assign them. The language which in particular man speaks now, the language which the inhabitants of whole districts speak now, is undoubtedly no sure test of the blood of their forefathers a thousand years back. So far language is no test of race; yet it is quite possible that, in another sense—a sense less strictly scientific, but yet practically useful—language may be a test of race. At all events, if not a test, it may be that kind of presumption on which men commonly act in practical affairs.

What, then, do we mean by a nation? What do we mean by a race—a word that is commonly taken to mean something wider than a nation? What a nation is, what a race is, is much easier to understand than to define. But it is quite certain that in our idea of a nation the ideas of common blood and common speech do come in, though certainly not in a strictly scientific shape. Speaking roughly, we expect a nation to consist of men of the same language under the same political government. There must be very few nations indeed which would really answer this definition. Still, there is truth in the definition. So far as any particular nation agrees with this definition, we accept it as the normal state of things which we look for, and we ask no questions about it. So far as the actual state of things departs from this definition we mark the fact, and we look why it is so. Take our own nation, for example. It answers the definition, and does not answer it, just as well as any other. The foreigner comes into England, and, within the bounds of what he reasonably and practically counts as England, he finds certain people who speak another language. He notes the fact as exceptional, and we can tell him the special reason. So we find beyond the ocean another great English-speaking nation. We ask the reason, and we find it to be that they are a part of the English nation which, through political causes, has split off and ceased to be English in a political sense. So in Germany, France, any other country, when in any district we find some other language than German or French spoken we note the exceptional fact, and we ask the special cause. When again, as in the case of Switzerland, we find a people who are politically one nation, but where the diversity of language is so great, where the minority is so large, that we cannot call it exceptional, we mark the fact as something different from our experience of England, Germany, or France. We ask and we learn the special historical cause. And, on the other hand, when, as in the case of Poland, we find a nation, as a nation is defined by speech, cut up between three several Governments, we again note the exceptional fact, and we ask and learn the special historical cause. In all these ways the number of cases which do not conform to the rule will far outnumber those that do; and yet we instinctively feel that the rule is the rule, and that the other cases are the exception.

Language, then, is distinctly an element in the idea of a nation; indeed, it is something more than an element; it is that which, in the absence of any causes working the other way, determines the nation. And, if it determines the nation, it must in the same way and to the same extent determine the race to which the nation forms a part. Mr. Sayce's objection is perfectly true; and yet, for practical, historical, political purposes, language is a test of race. Where is the difference? It pretty well comes to this. The practical, historical, political view, consistently for its own purposes, admits the doctrine of the Roman law which sets legal adoption on a level with natural generation. The purely scientific view, not less consistently for its own purposes, knows nothing of adoption, and will admit nothing but true physical descent. The race is like a Roman gens. Of the true nature of the gens we have often spoken before. It is a mistake to fancy that all the members of the gens were really kinsmen by blood.

THE DISMISSAL OF MIDHAT PASHA.

HOW A GRAND VIZIER WAS DISGRACED—EDHEM PASHA THE NEW PRIME MINISTER.

The Pera correspondent of a London daily telegraphs, Feb. 5, as follows: "This morning, about 11 o'clock, the news was spread that Midhat Pasha had been summoned to the presence of the Sultan by a hasty message. The next thing which betokened the astounding change impending in the Government was the sound of trumpets heard from a column of troops crossing the bridge of boats over the Golden Horn to take possession of the streets leading to the Offices of State. This armed body marched into the enceinte and proceeded to occupy and line the staircase leading to the apartment of the Grand Vizier. Very shortly an enormous crowd collected upon the spot, made up of Turkish officers, townsmen, European idlers, and others, among whom the rumor was current that a new Vizier had been appointed. The audience room, meantime, at the top of the staircase, was filled with pashas, beys, and effendis, all engaged in animated conversation, discussing the reasons for the extraordinary course which events had taken. Outside, the equally excited crowd was kept in order by the fixed bayonets of the troops. The band stationed in the great square presently struck up the Turkish national anthem, at the first notes of which the people cheered loudly. The officials inside immediately crowded to the windows, anxious to discover, by his approach, who the new Prime Minister was to be. The emotion at this moment was remarkable. Ulemas, generals, and civilians, who were all mingled with the common crowd, waiting to learn, by eyesight, the unknown personage that was to replace the great reformer. At this moment, through a passage formed by the military and police, Edhem Pasha made his appearance, thereby announcing himself as Midhat's successor. He was closely followed by the Sheik-ul-Islam, wearing the gold turban of his office, and by the Sultan's Secretary, having the ribbon of the Medjidie. Edhem Pasha was in full dress, with gold-braided coat and all his orders and insignia. Before he had entered the building, the Imperial Edict confirming his nomination was presented to him. He kissed it twice, and stood up while the Secretary read in a loud voice the terms of the Sultan's decree. When this was finished, the Shiek-ul-Islam offered up a prayer amid deep responses from those around, after which all the officials pressed forward to present their congratulations to the new Premier. Subsequently an informal Council of State was convened the principal business of which seemed to be sitting round and smoking pipes of astonishment and contemplation. The Imperial rescript states that Midhat Pasha's exile was rendered necessary for constitutional reasons. It confirms all the constitutional provisions, and alludes to the reorganization of the finances by European specialists.

THE DRAMA IN JAPAN.

A PLAY-HOUSE IN YEDDO—THE MEDIÆVAL LYRIC DRAMA OF "NO"—AN ARISTOCRATIC AUDIENCE—THE STAGE SETTINGS—THE ACTORS.

From the Cornhill Magazine.

Up a narrow alley in that part of Yeddo known a li-gura, or the "rice store," the tourist, were any strange chance to direct his steps along a path so little frequented, might start on hearing the sound of vociferously loud, and apparently angry, voices issuing from one of the houses on his right. The chiming in of the drum or of the flute would, however, soon reassure him: no deadly quarrel is being fought out inside the gates; for in Japan, as in more Western lands, sanguinary feuds have now quite gone out of fashion, and the loud, angry-sounding voices are only discarded favorites, which came to my knowledge an officer in the Egyptian Army, who had been honored in the above way, on seeing his bride for the first time after the wedding found her so unattractive that he refused to live with her, and persisted in his determination, although warned of the displeasure he would incur in high quarters. A GIGANTIC MODEL DAIRY.

From the London Court Circular.

The food supply of the Metropolis has long engrossed a large share of public attention, and upon the purity of the articles supplied depends in a great measure the health and happiness of its inhabitants. Some 10 years since the design was introduced of supplying the dwellers in this great city with milk and other dairy produce which, for general excellence, could not be surpassed. Like most good works, these laudable efforts were at first in a great measure abortive; but by dint of perseverance and good management, the Aylesbury Dairy Company has assumed an importance far exceeding even the most sanguine expectations of its originators, and may fairly be designated one of the most useful and prosperous corporations now in operation. To give some idea of the gigantic nature of the business so successfully developed by this company, we may state that they daily supply some 5,000 families with milk, which is guaranteed, so far as human care and judgment can ensure it, to be not only of the purest description, but obtained from perfectly healthy sources. Upward of 25,000 gallons of milk are dealt with every week, being the produce of nearly 50 farms in some of the best of our dairy counties. To carry on this enormous trade the company have, in addition to their town premises in St. Petersburgh place, Bayswater, a large factory at Swindon and a dairy at Bourton, where all the surplus milk is converted into cheese. With such admirable sources of supply it is not a matter of surprise that the business has rapidly extended, and that a successful a commercial result has been achieved. The Aylesbury Dairy Company can take into their Swindon factory 3,000 gallons of milk daily, which they hold, as it were, in reserve. In the summer time, when the fashionable world is seeking recreation in garden parties, and when strawberries and cream and other such-like seasonable delicacies are in request, then the company are in a position to meet any sudden demand. They possess every modern appliance suitable for the dairy, and have the power of setting 1,500 gallons of milk in 800 square feet of milk-pans—the product from which in 10 hours' time will be a large quantity of cream. The cream is daily sent to London, and after the orders are executed the surplus is made into butter, the excellence of which is such that the demand exceeds the supply.

AMERICAN RED TAPE ABROAD.

The London correspondent of a Liverpool newspaper writes: "I have not seen so striking an example of the great depression of trade as is afforded by the returns of French exports to America. Seeing that 1876 was the Centennial year, and that great increase instead of great decrease of American activity might have been expected, the returns are very striking. I had certainly expected, for instance, that in a year of festivities, champagne would have been in request across the Atlantic ferry. But no: the export from Rheims, which in 1872 was valued at more than £2,500,000, was last year less than £1,500,000. In 1872 the trade from various large towns was valued at $72,000,000; last year it was $48,000,000. Paris, which exported $37,500,000 in 1875, last year exported less than $28,000,000. These figures are exceedingly striking. Unfortunately, I cannot obtain the figures for English trade. The American Consulate refuses to render them. It is a little similar with English red tape. If there were a more obliging disposition the lists could be written out in a quarter of an hour, nobody be harmed, and the world made the wiser.

LAW REPORTS.

RIGHTS OF THE ELEVATED ROAD.

A DECISION AGAINST THE COMPANY—THE CONSTRUCTION OF ADDITIONAL TRACKS AND SWITCHES HELD TO BE UNLAWFUL.

Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday rendered a decision in the case of John Patten against the New-York Elevated Railroad Company, which was recently tried. The action was brought by the plaintiff, who is the owner of a hotel in Greenwich-street, to restrain the defendants from constructing or operating their road on the westerly side of Greenwich-street, in front of his premises, and to recover $10,000 damages for their trespass on his premises. Judge Daly holds that the following points were established on the decision by the General Term of the court in continuing the preliminary injunction prayed for: First, that the plaintiff has a standing in court, and is entitled to maintain the action by reason of the special damage he sustained; and, secondly, that the railroad company is entitled to operate only such portions of the road as were built within the limitation of time fixed by the act of April 22, 1867, which incorporated the Yonkers and West Side Patented Railway Company, which was the predecessor of the present company. "Such rights," says Judge Daly, "as the defendants or the grantees of the said franchises had not availed themselves of were lost, and any private citizen specially injured by an attempt to carry them into effect can maintain his action to restrain such attempt. Under the act of 1867 the grantees of the franchise were authorized to construct and operate an elevated railway on both sides of Greenwich-street to Ninth-avenue, and on both sides of Ninth-avenue to the Harlem River. An experimental section of the road was to be constructed within one year from the passage of the act, and the extension of the road within the City of New-York was to be constructed within five years thereafter. The time within which to construct the whole road expired on April 22, 1873. Within the time so limited a single track road was constructed on the easterly side of Greenwich-street, and on the westerly side of Ninth-avenue to Thirtieth-street. By the failure to construct within the time limited a track upon the opposite side of these streets, i. e., upon the westerly side of Greenwich-street and the easterly side of Ninth-avenue, the right to do so was lost, and defendants are to be regarded as operating, by authority of law, only a single track railway along those streets, on the line where the track was constructed within the prescribed time. The question not passed upon by the General Term and raised for the first time in this case upon the trial before me is, whether defendants after the expiration of the time limited by the act of 1867, have the right in their discretion to erect upon and along those streets, at any place they may deem fit, additional tracks on the side of the street opposite to the completed single track, upon the ground that such additional tracks are necessary for switches, sidings, and turn-outs in the operation of their single-track road. * * * Defendants have constructed the following additional tracks on the westerly side of Greenwich-street: A track 393 feet in length from Cortlandt-street to a point south of Morris-street; a track 649 feet in length from Thames-street to Cortlandt-street; a track 530 feet in length from a point north of Harrison-street to a point north of North Moore-street; a track 1,060 feet in length from Vandam-street to Clarkson-street; a track 4,772 feet in length from Perry-street, on Greenwich-street, to Twenty-fourth-street on Ninth-avenue; and additional tracks on Ninth-avenue, opposite their single track, which are, respectively, 725 feet and 2,531 feet up to Fifty-first-street. These additional tracks connect with the original single track by crossing the street at the points above mentioned as the beginning and end of each additional track. So connected, they are apparently switches or sidings of greater or less extent. Plaintiff claims, however, that these additional tracks were originally intended as parts of a separate single track along the whole line of Greenwich-street and Ninth-avenue, and that they and all other additional tracks contemplated under the name of switches or sidings are intended by defendants to be, and will in effect, by their proximity, number, and ultimate continuity, by reason of further connection, constitute a separate, independent road or track along Greenwich-street and Ninth-avenue, which defendants have not authority to construct or operate, owing to their failure to so construct or operate it, or any part or parts of it, within the time limited by the act of 1867." Continuing, Judge Daly says he thinks the defendants have only the right to operate the portion of the road built within the time limited, and, that being merely a single track road between certain points, the company has not the general rights to put up any number of additional tracks for any length and at any places the company may elect, upon the ground that they are necessary for switches, turn-outs, and sidings. "To hold," remarks Judge Daly, "that the proposed additional tracks of the defendant are authorized as incident to the right of operating a single track railroad would be far reaching in its consequences, and involve more than the determination of the rights of this particular road in these particular streets." The act of 1875 in regard to the company is held to be unconstitutional. Judgment is given for the plaintiff.

A SUIT AGAINST THE EQUITABLE LIFE.

The somewhat unique suit of Lyman Elmore against the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States was brought before Judge Robinson, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday, and argument was had on a motion by the plaintiff for an order for the examination as witnesses before trial of the President and other officers of the society. The plaintiff in the case is the owner of a $2,000 life insurance policy of the society, and seeks a discovery of the corporation's methods of doing business. He alleges that the Directors had no right to erect the costly building they have built, and that the President and other officers of the society are paid larger salaries than they should receive. The answer of the society denies specifically the plaintiff's charges. In opposition to the motion yesterday, the society urged that the plaintiff's application was not made in good faith, but merely to annoy and harass the company and its officers; that the proposed examination was merely an endeavor to "fish for" testimony to sustain a suit which, it was alleged, there is now an investigation proceeding by a committee of policy holders, in which the society is furnishing all the information necessary for the policy holders; and that the plaintiff has no legal standing in court, nor any right to call the society to account before asking the Directors to institute an investigation. Decision was reserved. G. R. Butler appeared for the plaintiff, and Aaron J. Vanderpoel and ex-Judge James Emott for the society.

A BRACE OF BURGLARS HELD FOR TRIAL.

Patrick Fay and William O'Neil, who were arrested on a charge of burglariously entering the store of Rosenbaum & Friedman, No. 39 Thomas-street, on Wednesday evening last, and stealing about $6,000 worth of laces, silks, &c., were arraigned at the Tombs Police Court yesterday, before Justice Duffy. Capt. Caffrey, of the Fifth Precinct, said he thought the men had secreted themselves in the building some time on Wednesday, and had forced the lock of the door of the second floor occupied by Rosenbaum & Friedman, during Wednesday night. Early on Thursday morning the prisoners were arrested by Officer Fogarty, while in the act of carrying away a trunk containing $4,000 worth of the goods, and Capt. Caffrey went to the room of Fay, at No. 221 Eldridge-street, and found there another trunk containing $1,500 worth of wearing apparel, the property of the daughter of one of the members of the firm. A third trunk, containing about $1,000 worth of goods, is still missing. The men were held for trial at General Sessions, in default of $4,000 bail each.

AN UNKIND FATHER REBUKED.

While a number of boys were playing yesterday on Firat-avenue, John Smith, aged 9 years, of No. 407 East Sixteenth-street, sent a stone through the store window of William G. Maxwell. He was arrested and taken before Judge Smith, at the Fifty-seventh-street Police Court, where he was fined $10 or 10 days in the Tombs. His father, a respectable looking man, was present, but refused to pay the fine, and, after shaking hands with the little fellow in a most cold-hearted manner, he deserted him, and left the court-room. Some minutes after the convulsive sobs of the little fellow attracted the attention of Judge Smith, who called him forward, and, learning of his father's unnatural conduct, said: "My boy, you have the most unfeeling parent I have ever seen in the course of my career on the bench, but if your father has deserted you it will not. You can go home." The words of the court Cangi all over the room, and touched a sympathetic cord in the hearts of all present.

AH LEY SAYS AH FONG KILLED AH FUNG.

Ah Fong, the Chinaman suspected of complicity with Ah Ha in the murder of Ah Fung, on Jan. 28, was discharged by the Coroner, Ah Fong having positively denied that he had anything to do with the murder or that he ever was on the premises No. 17 Forsyth-street. Yesterday Ah Ley, another Chinaman, residing at No. 25 Bowery, came to the Tombs Police Court with three of his countrymen, and made an affidavit that he saw Ah Fong coming out of the house in Forsyth-street about the time the murder occurred, and that he believed that Ah Fong murdered Ah Fung. On this complaint a warrant was issued, and as Ah Ley said he knew the whereabouts of Ah Fong it was expected that the latter would soon be in custody.

PERSONATION OF AN OFFICER.

Joseph A. Calvert, who was paroled on Tuesday by Justice Duffy to appear yesterday to answer a charge of having arrested Andrew J. Mellen, of Philadelphia, by representing that he was an officer, voluntarily appeared yesterday to answer the charge. Calvert and Mellen were both represented by counsel. Calvert exhibited a warrant from Police Justice Cambell, of Philadelphia, for Mellen's arrest, and stated that he had, immediately after the arrest, communicated with Superintendent Walling about the matter, and that the Superintendent had detailed Detective Tiernan to go with him before Justice Bixby, who held Mellen to await a requisition from the Governor of Pennsylvania, which requisition had since been sent, and that a writ of habeas corpus obtained by Mellen's counsel had been dismissed and Mellen remanded to the custody of the Sheriff. It was finally arranged to discharge Calvert on his parole to appear again on the first Wednesday of March, by which time it is expected a trial will have been had in the civil suit instituted against Mellen, and in which he was arrested by the Sheriff.

THE CASE OF JOSEPH COBURN.

THE WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS DISMISSED BY JUDGE BRADY—THE CASE SENT BACK TO GENERAL SESSIONS.

A crowd of "roughs," some sporting men, several policemen, and a small troop of lawyers escorted Joseph Coburn into the Court of Oyer and Terminer yesterday morning, at which place and time Judge Brady was sitting, prepared to hear argument on a writ of habeas corpus, whereby the prisoner's release on bail was sought. Coburn, whose head was swathed in bandages, but who looked much more like a scarecrow than the interesting invalid his counsel sought to make him out to be, was quietly inducted into the prisoner's pen, where he sat beside the boy Robert Gerraty, who is on trial for homicide. The lawyers disposed themselves in a group around the table reserved for counsel, and the policemen devoted their energies to the controlling of the mob of uncouth spectators, who were rather inclined to be unruly. Charles W. Brooke, George M. Curtis, and others appeared for the prisoner, and Assistant District Attorney Russell represented the prosecution. Mr. Russell interposed the preliminary objection that the case being one in which an indictment found in the General Sessions is now pending, and one which had actually been set down for a fixed day for trial, any application to admit the prisoner to bail according to regular procedure should be made in the General Sessions. Mr. Brooke called attention to the harsh manner in which he said the prisoner had been treated. He had been beaten, bruised, mangled, and taken to prison in an almost unconscious condition. His family physician had been denied access to him, as had also his counsel, and an attempt was being made to hurry on his trial before he was recovered. Mr. Curtis made a long speech, in which he referred in strong terms to the conduct of the Police. The attack drew forth much applause from the mob at the rear of the court-room. Judge Brady, after hearing the addresses of the counsel, dismissed the writ, and sent the case back to the Court of General Sessions, directing, however, that the prisoner's family physician should be allowed to see his patient. After Judge Brady's decision had been rendered, Coburn was taken to the District Attorney's office, to await the action of Judge Sutherland. There being no court in session, Judge Sutherland did not come to his chambers, and a messenger was dispatched to his residence, requesting him to hear a renewal of the application for bail. After two hours' waiting it became apparent that his Honor would not appear, and Coburn was taken back to the Tombs. The motion will probably be made before Judge Sutherland to-day.

FREEZING OUT STOCKHOLDERS.

CONTRACTS FOR CONTROLLING THE AFFAIRS OF CORPORATIONS DECLARED VOID AND AGAINST PUBLIC POLICY AND GOOD MORALS.

An important decision was rendered by Judge Van Vorst, in the Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday, in the case of Joseph C. Jacobs against Sylvester J. Miller. The plaintiff in the suit, it appears, entered into an agreement with the defendant for the purpose of getting and maintaining a controlling influence in a patent paint company, and with the further object of installing a man named Pool as President, the plaintiff as Vice President of the company, and of electing as Directors persons who would act for the interests of the parties. The scheme failed to work, however, and the plaintiff therefore brought suit to compel Miller to pay back some money received by the latter from the plaintiff for stock of the company. Judge Van Vorst rendered his decision orally, and in the course of his remarks said: "Any combination or agreement between stockholders in a corporation to seize it and operate it in their interest, is void as against good morals and public policy, because it looks absolutely to the destruction of the interests of others who are not contemplated by the agreement, who have never been considered by it, and who are absolutely, by the terms of the agreement, at the mercy of the contracting parties. I take it that no corporation is to be run for the joint benefit of any particular stockholders. I suppose a corporation must be operated for the benefit of the stockholders. I don't see how a court of equity can look with favor upon any contract, whether made between officers of a corporation or the stockholders having a secret combination among themselves, to acquire the stock and operate it for their benefit. Now, this agreement contemplated the acquiring of the interests of other stockholders besides those of the parties. The scheme was so comprehensive that it looked to the acquisition by these three parties of the entire stock of the corporation. Now, it can be readily seen if once parties, installing themselves in offices in a corporation, commence to run the corporation in what is supposed to be their interests, how very soon they could bring the other stockholders to their feet. It, doubtless, might be considered for their interest to run it unprofitably, so that the stockholders who were not comprised in this agreement and knew nothing about it would be very glad to sell out their stock. I regard it as against public policy and good morals, and I think the outcome of such arrangements is injurious—that the fruits of such an undertaking cannot but be pernicious; and I think it is no part of the duty of a court of equity to regard agreements of this kind with favor, nor to administer to the parties any relief, but to leave them precisely where they have put themselves." The contract which formed the basis of the plaintiff's claim, Judge Van Vorst held to be void, and he therefore dismissed the complaint.

COURT NOTES.

David W. McCall, indicted for subornation of perjury, in connection with the "straw" bail cases, was released on $2,500 bail yesterday, Jesse McCall, of No. 9 West Forty-second-street, and Hubert L. Hind, of No. 198 Leffert-place, Brooklyn, becoming his bondsmen.

Chief Justice Davis, in Supreme Court Chambers, yesterday granted an application awarding the custody of Jeremiah Crowley, a minor, to his grandfather, Edward Crowley. The boy had been taken from the Catholic Protectory in November last by his aunt, Ellen White.

The matter of sentencing James Rice, who was convicted of manslaughter in the third degree, in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, a few days since, was postponed yesterday until Monday. Some of the jurors have signed a petition for a suspension or commutation of sentence, and an endeavor is being made to have the petition signed by all of the jurors.

The case of Franz Nessel against the Mayor, &c., was brought to trial before Judge J. F. Daly and a jury in Part III. of the Court of Common Pleas yesterday. The plaintiff fell into an excavation at One Hundred and Twentieth-street and Fourth-avenue, and sues to recover $10,000 damages for the injuries received. The City claims that the accident was due to his negligence. The case is still on.

Philip Connolly, who said he was a native of "Keenetient," was arrested on Sunday night while lying drunk at the base of Washington's Monument, in Union square. At the Fifty-seventh-street Court yesterday his comical appearance and drawling tone created intense amusement. He was discharged, Judge Smith saying, in the most solemn manner, that he could not find it in his heart to punish one so intensely patriotic as to lie down to sleep at the feet of the Father of his Country.

Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court Chambers yesterday, rendered a decision in the matter of the Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company, in which Mrs. Rebecca L. Miller petitions to have the Receiver of the company compelled to pay in full the claims for losses and deaths arising under policies. In his decision Judge Donohue says: "In this case I do not think the court is authorized to make the order prayed for. But, as some of the parties desire to have the merits passed upon, I will deny it on the merits, that a review may be had."

Judge Brady, in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, yesterday received briefs from counsel in the matter of William Connors, whose extradition to Massachusetts is sought, it being claimed he was "accessory after the fact" in the Northampton bank robbery. The prisoner's counsel, it will be recollected, tried to show an alibi. The counsel for the prosecution insist, however, that this is not inconsistent with the fact of the prisoner's being guilty of crime. Decision was reserved, it being understood that it will be rendered on Monday.

Robert Gerraty, who has been indicted for murder in the first degree for killing John Smith on July 4, 1876, was put on trial before Judge Brady and a jury, in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, yesterday. The details of the case have been published in THE TIMES before. The prisoner's defense is that he was set upon and beaten by a crowd of men, and that he used the cart rung on Smith in self-defense. Gerraty is only about 16 years of age, though he looks older. His mother swore yesterday that he came home on the evening of the homicide in a badly bruised condition. The case will probably be given to the jury to-day.

The trial of the case of Henry W. Thaule against Margaret Krekeler was finished in Part III. of the Supreme Court yesterday. The action was brought to recover $10,000 for alleged malicious prosecution. In addition to the facts already published, the plaintiff showed that the defendant had threatened to take his life, and that she had said she would send him to State Prison. The jury gave plaintiff a verdict for $3,500, and Judge Van Brunt added an extra allowance of $100 to plaintiff's counsel. D. M. Porter appeared for the plaintiff, and H. A. Frost and Charles Halberstadt for the defendant.

SYMMES AND HOWGATE.

WHAT THE BELIEVER IN THE POLAR OPENING THINKS OF THE LATTER'S PLAN OF REACHING THE OPEN POLAR SEA.

From the Louisville Courier-Journal, Feb. 20.

In conversation with Mr. American Symmes, the present upholder of what is generally referred to as "Symmes' Theory," a reporter of the Courier-Journal was made acquainted with several facts of interest. After alluding to the Howgate plan, which is to have persons gradually approach the North Pole as they become accustomed to the climate of the Arctic regions, Mr. Symmes said:

"Should the Howgate plan to reach the pole be adopted as the best, and another expedition be started out in search of the North Pole, it would be best to make some arrangement to have a part of the expedition test the truth of the Symmes theory, while the others were making slow approaches to the pole as proposed by Mr. Howgate. Capt. Tyson, of Capt. Hall's expedition, has written a work called Arctic Experience, in which he says: 'Though I do not believe in an open polar sea, yet I know that the currents and animals inhabit the northern regions go off north every Fall and come back in the Spring fat, with their young following them.' Such is also the testimony of Dr. Kane, Capt. Parry, and Capt. Ross, all of whom made more than one voyage to the extreme north. Into what country or climate those animals go to spend the Winter and produce their young has never been discovered, but that they do go northward is proved beyond a doubt. According to the Symmes theory they pass over the verge and into the polar opening, where they find a warmer and more genial climate, and where they find plenty to live on and produce their young, coming back fatter than when they left. Where these animals travel man can surely follow; so let a part of the men follow in their wake, and if they reach 'Symmzonia,' (as Capt. Symmes intended to call that undiscovered country,) they will have accomplished more than any previous expedition. Capt. Hall got about as far north as 82° and found open water, and while encamped on the bank of an open sea, he wrote his last dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy, in which he says: 'I find this a much warmer country than I expected, and it abounds with life—seal, game, geese, ducks, musk cattle, foxes, wolves, rabbits, partridges, lemings,' &c., showing that he was just entering 'Symmzonia' when his set time for returning to his vessel had expired, and he went back, and was taken sick and died. Capt. Parry, on his third voyage, got up to 82° 45', and here found the sun so hot that it melted the tar out of the seams of his vessel, and even small flies came on board of the boat. What ice was in sight was too rotten to bear his weight, and, being nearly out of provisions, he had to turn back. Capt. Ross experienced warm winds coming directly from the north when he was farthest northward, and Dr. Kane's men found open water, experienced a gale for three days, having steadily from the north, and once it became so warm as to melt the snow and ice about them and far south of them. What does this all mean? What must it mean? A warmer climate is certainly somewhere northward, not yet discovered. Therefore, I say divide the expedition when the eighty-first or eighty-second degree is reached, and let one party follow the wild animals into their retreats northward, or 'within the verge,' and the other follow Mr. Howgate's plan."

CHICAGO'S BABY SHOW.

Chicago had a baby show on Monday, and the Inter-Ocean thus describes it: "The babies behaved after the generality of infant cherubs, some sitting in solemn state in embroidered dress and pink sash without rumpling even one of the dainty curls, and others threatening to wriggle entirely out of all dry goods, and acting altogether more like a young pollywog than a specimen of the genus homo. It will not be a matter of surprise that the girls showed the least trace of original sin, while the boys were more prone to warlike. The Secretary would occasionally step upon a dry goods box, and, holding up a stray baby, inquire for an owner; but these little incidents caused scarce a ripple. The rooms were thronged with fond mammas, the babies who were showing, and the admiring public. Were the babies pretty? Well, they didn't look like like lumps of putty, as envious bachelors say all babies do, but some of them were uncommonly pretty-faced, while others were beautiful as one's dream of the angels. There were two who attracted unusual attention on account of their size, one of them the daughter of J. Crabtree, 16 months old, a fair-haired little girl, who weighed 45 pounds, and another a year old yesterday, who weighed 40 pounds. The entries closed at 3 o'clock, and there were 182 babies. Of these 109 were boys, and 73 girls. This is looked upon by those who have considered the subject as a bad omen, for in any country the year preceding a war will be found to be one of unusual births of girls."

No triplets were entered, but there were 12 pairs of twins. Of these there were six pairs of girls, five pairs of boys, and one pair of a boy and a girl. All classes of the community are represented, and besides our own people there are also sprinklings of Germans, French, Scandinavians, and Norwegians. A large proportion—more than half—however, are from the better class of Americans."

CATTLE RAISING IN LOUISIANA.

WHAT HAS BEEN DONE IN THE PAST—EXPECTED RESTORATION OF THE BUSINESS.

From the New-Orleans Times, Feb. 14.

Cattle raising is almost one of the lost arts or abandoned occupations in Louisiana. Thirty or 40 years ago, four-fifths of the beef consumed in New-Orleans, and along the Mississippi as far up as Vicksburg, came from the Louisiana prairies. To-day, not one-tenth of the beef which is slaughtered at the abbatoirs in New-Orleans is raised in Louisiana. All the holiday beef, extra fat, in those days came down by the big steam-boats from the blue-grass pastures of Kentucky. Now Tennessee has taken the place of Kentucky in this trade, and sends her fat cattle by rail, but Texas furnishes five-eights of all our beef.

The vast increase and accumulation of cattle in Texas during the four years of war, owing to the want of a market, gave Texas great advantages in controling the beef supply. The havoc made in the herds of Western Louisiana by the demands of many armies and the depredations of jayhawkers, greatly depleted the vacheries and lessened the stock of breeding cattle. Much lawlessness prevailed in Southwestern Louisiana for several years after the war, and vigilant committees were organized to suppress cattle thieving in a summary way. The remedy was as bad as the disorder, and the business of stock growing did not prosper until the present time. The stock raisers of these prairies have rallied slowly, but from all accounts they are now, for the first time in many years, in a condition to compete with the Texans. The immense region of prairie in Western Louisiana was especially adapted to cattle. The French and Spanish found it filled with herds of buffalo, and all the early settlers there were stock-raisers.

This portion of Louisiana is one of the choicest spots on the American Continent, but it is almost isolated and is as yet but little known to the great world. It will soon be penetrated by railroads at several points, when the rush of immigration will pour into it. The prairies extend in the shape of a triangle, from Alexandria on Red River, as the apex, to the mouth of the Sabine, and by the other to the mouth of Teche, with the third side extending along the Gulf. The prairie, proper, contains nearly 3,000,000 acres, crossed with numerous wooded streams in every direction, while the sea-marsh, which is equally as good for cattle raising as the high prairie, contains 2,000,000 more acres. This triangular tract is bounded on two sides by the largest and densest forests on the continent, and is open broadly on the third to the soft air of the Gulf. The climate is mild in Winter, cool in Summer, and the whole region is better protected against cold and violent changes of weather than any other region of the Union. It is this which makes it unapproachable as cattle country. The orange flourishes farther up in this prairie than in any portion of the country east of the Rocky Mountains, which indicates the temperature.

The Opelousas prairie alone contains 1,200,000 acres, and once fed the largest herds then known. There the great vacheries of the Wiltzes, the Guidrys, the Dupres, Taylors, and others were located. Darby, the geographer, was enraptured with the prospect of these prairies covered with cattle, and as far back as 1817 said: "There you behold those vast herds of cattle which afford subsistence for the native and the inhabitants of New-Orleans."

It was along the Teche and its beautiful prairies that Longfellow located the principal scenes in his "Evangeline," and gives a glowing description of Old Basil, the blacksmith, transformed into the lordly herdsman of the Teche.

It is gratifying to know that the stock of cattle is not only increasing in this prairie region, but that nearly every portion of Louisiana is filling up with an improved breed of cattle, graded on the old stock. There were but few cattle lost by the cold in Louisiana, but thousands and tons of thousands were frozen to death on the Texas prairies and on the great plains of the West and all over Texas. This is greatly in favor of the Louisiana stock raiser, and is a large score for the superiority of the climate. The 1,500,000 acres of fine flats of Louisiana, which lie near the Gulf, are as good as the prairie for stock, if the frequent burning could be prevented. A large area of such lands lies in the Florida parishes, and could be rapidly put into grass and used for cattle raising with great profit.

DISGRACEFUL COMPROMISES.

A local correspondent of the Boston Traveller contributes the following: "A few years since a merchant in a neighboring State failed. His liabilities being centred here, he came to the city to lay his affairs before his creditors. He called upon one of the largest of these—a well-known firm—for advice. A compromise paper was prepared, and first signed by this firm. It was in turn presented to each of his creditors, and generally signed by, a result due in a great measure, beyond doubt, to the leading signature. The consideration given for this assistance was the payment of the first signer's claim in full, as expressly provided for beforehand. Another merchant in the same business subsequently failed, and his failure was believed to be an honest one. He made a statement to his creditors, and the customary committee of investigation was appointed to examine his affairs. The committee recommended the acceptance of the offer made by the bankrupt. The suspicion of one of the creditors was aroused that all was not right. In the absence of proof, however, the matter was passed over to the bankrupt on obtaining a quick and easy settlement. An admission afterward made by the debtor confirmed the suspicion of the creditor alluded to, that one or more of the committee had received a larger dividend than their neighbors.

Still another merchant in this same line of business was forced to succumb to the 'hard times.' All of his creditors, with one exception, considered him honest and worthy of sympathy. The solitary doubter, on hearing of the failure, accused the debtor of being a 'swindler,' and avowed his intention to probe matters to the very bottom to discover his rascality. At the meeting of the creditors, however, he was quite lamb-like, and unusually favorable to the bankrupt. His 'change of heart' was the result of a secret interview between him and the debtor before the creditors' meeting. The bankrupt's offer was large, and all he could afford to pay, yet he was so afraid of the dishonest creditor that he purchased his silence.

Here is another case. An honest bankrupt, shown so after a thorough examination of his affairs, presented a compromise paper to his creditors, offering a very large dividend. Having obtained the signatures of a large majority, he called on a prominent firm here for theirs. He was asked to call again. As the party making the request was the last man he counted upon, and their claim small, the honest but insolvent debtor was somewhat surprised. He complied with the request—having in the meantime obtained the balance of the signatures—only to find himself the victim of a shrewd dodge. They refused absolutely to settle with him, unless he gave them 10 per cent. extra. He refused. He was told that if he was foolish enough to go through bankruptcy at an expense greater than their whole amount, just to please his fancy, he was at liberty to do so. He was at their mercy, and they knew it. He paid them the extra pittance of less than $20 to save a greater loss in time and money."

AN EXPLORER EATEN.

The San Francisco Bulletin of Feb. 9 says: "Recent advices report the death of Dr. W. H. James, a former resident of San Francisco, on the island of Papua or New-Guinea, he having been sacrificed and devoured by the cannibals inhabiting it. Dr. James was assistant physician at the City and County Hospital from 1856 to 1858. He afterward went to Nevada, and practiced his profession in Gold Hill for several years. When the White pine fever broke out he was among the thousands who flocked to that locality. Afterward he went to Nye County, from which he was elected to the Nevada Legislature. Two years ago he returned to this city, but finding no opportunity to practice his profession he sailed for Australia. The melancholy news just received is the first information his friends have had about him since he left. The Doctor was attached to an exploring expedition, which was endeavoring to explore the island, and he, with a companion, became separated from it. They were then surrounded by savages and killed and eaten."

A METEORITE IN COURT.

A letter from Des Moines, Iowa, dated 12th inst., says: "In February, 1875, a large meteor went splurging over Iowa, and burst all to pieces round about Iowa County. A man named Mass found in the highway, on the lands of the Amana Society, a fragment weighing 75 pounds. The title to it came into court. Mass claimed it to be his by right of discovery and possession. The society claimed that, it being on the highway over their lands, it belonged to the realty by accretion from natural causes. This was certainly a new question in law, which the courts had not heretofore decided; and, in this case, the court held that the fragment belonged to the realty, and that the title was in the society, whose will present the chunk to Prof. Heinrichs, of the State University, who will place it with the other portions of the meteor deposited there."

DAMAGES AGAINST A RAILROAD.

The Albany Journal of Wednesday evening says: "In September, 1873, Anton Dreimiller, of this city, was a passenger on an Albany and Susquehanna train, and owing to his having lost his ticket, or from some other cause, was ejected from the train. He brought suit through his counsel, Messrs. Green & Dreyer, to recover damages, and after the lapse of a considerable time the action was referred to Mr. Nathan P. Hinman to hear and determine. The hearing was concluded before the Referee yesterday afternoon, when he found in favor of the plaintiff for $500 and costs."

AN ESQUIMAUX WEDDING.

CURIOUS CUSTOMS IN THE NORTH.

COMPARISON OF THE BRIDE'S AND THE GROOM'S PORTIONS—A RICH FEAST OF OIL, BLUBBER, AND FISH—A QUEERLY-ACCOUTERED PRIEST—THE MARRIAGE CEREMONY.

From the San Francisco Mail.

The lookout on board the Clytemnestra, cruising in the northern regions in search of furs and adventures, one evening reported land right ahead.

Our anchor down and all things prepared for trade, we received the chief of the island and his officers on the quarter-deck, who made known to us, through the interpreter, that he would be glad to have us come on shore to witness a marriage ceremony between his daughter and one of the tribe, to take place next day. While shown over the vessel we had an opportunity to judge of the islanders.

By the aid of the glass we could discern the snow-capped peak of Wat-wak, a small island in the westernmost group of the Aleutian or Fox Islands. As it was broken weather, we concluded to make all sail and stand in to a small, almost circular, cove, described in the English Admiralty chart as containing good shelter and "holding ground." Imagine our surprise when some 12 miles off land to find ourselves beseiged by hundreds of canoes, each containing but one occupant, and riding upon the water as easily and dry as so many gulls. Our mate, who speaks the Esquimaux language fluently, soon struck a bargain for a pilot, and in an instant the pilot, by a dextrous jump landed in the "chains" and was on deck, still holding the painter of his canoe.

The chief was of Herculean build, broad and well knit frame, and a complexion far more fair than the bronzed and weather-beaten faces of our people. His features were of the Indian type, but also had a certain light of intelligence which, naturally enough, accounted for the almost abject manner in which his followers obeyed his slightest behest. He was dressed in fur, completely encased, leaving no part exposed but the face. The chief was a widower, and solemnly kept his faith to the peculiar vows uttered at his wedding, which ceremony I will describe further on; in consequence, the only lady present was the bride elect, his daughter, a comely woman of some eighteen summers, or more properly, Winters. She was clothed in a dress of the same description as that of her father, and was of goodly stature—above the medium height of American women—and was possessed of wonderfully small feet, encased in moccasins of rare and curious workmanship, which would excite the envy of some of our belles—the feet, not the moccasins. Her features were of the Indian, oval cast, prominent cheek bones; small, firm, well-defined chin, and a most bewitching mouth, containing a display of teeth of unusual whiteness and uniformity; but, alas for the weakness of the human family, to what base uses were these same teeth put at the wedding feast.

We were rowed ashore the following day, well provided with presents for the chief and the happy pair, which consisted of rum, beads, blankets, flaming calicos, a plug hat of wonderful dimensions and a large, cheap looking-glass, also a large jar of common lard, which had been cleverly scented with otto of roses by the mate. We landed amid the acclamations of the multitude and incessant clatter of a species of drum made of seal skin and whalebone,

MR. TILDEN AS A WITNESS.

THE SUIT OF BOODY AGAINST OGDEN.

HIS EXAMINATION CONCERNING HIS RELATIONS WITH BOODY IN RAILROAD MATTERS—HIS REPLIES TO MANY QUESTIONS VERY UNSATISFACTORY—HIS DEMEANOR ON THE WITNESS-STAND—HE CONSIDERS THE SETTLEMENT WITH BOODY FINAL.

Samuel J. Tilden appeared as a witness in the Superior Court, Special Term, yesterday, in the trial of the suit of Henry H. Boody against William B. Ogden and others. He did not seem at all at his ease in the position he occupied, and his testimony was of a rather unsatisfactory character. It is a favorite expression among lawyers, according to Dickens, that there are two kinds of bad witnesses. One of these is the unwilling witness, and the other the too willing witness. Mr. Tilden in his examination yesterday appeared in both characters. He was not well posted about matters concerning which information was sought, and was a little too eager to give information which none of the counsel nor the court desired to hear. Another point about the witness was his suspiciousness. He seemed to think that the testimony he might give utterance to would be used in the income tax or railroad litigations against him. On one occasion he even went so far as to say he did not see the relevancy of certain questions propounded to him, unless they were put for the purpose of using his answers in suits against him. His manner of testifying, too, was somewhat disagreeable. He snuffled all through his testimony, spoke his words indistinctly, and could be heard at a distance of a few feet only with great difficulty. He had a peculiar habit, too, of rubbing up his hair with the palms of his hands and of slapping his hands upon one knee or the other or upon the Judge's desk. In general, when not checked, he was very garrulous, and wandered off into irrelevant discussions, apparently with the hope of "setting himself straight" before the community in regard to the transactions in suit, liability for which he escaped by his successful plea of the statute of limitation. He even tried to edge in some apology or reason for pleading the statute, which he must have known was not proper testimony. He kept appealing to the court from time to time to escape answering questions put to him, and on one occasion at least was rather ill-respectful to Judge Sedgwick, who bore patiently with the witness' garrulity, disinclination to give proper answers, and ill temper. Mr. Tillen had been called as a witness on behalf of the defendants, and so he was first questioned by W. W. Niles, their counsel. In answer to interrogatories, the witness denied that he had ever made any agreement with Mr. Boody, or that he ever authorized or suggested to Boody to sell the Chicago and North-western stock in advance; the witness also denied having had anything to do with Boody in the final settlement of August, 1864, whereby the witness came out $26,000 ahead; he denied there ever was a pretense that the settlement in question was not a final settlement; he said he had never seen Mr. Boody on the subject. The witness was then asked if there was any intimation to him that the settlement was merely temporary? Mr. Tilden, before answering, desired the construction of the court as to how far he should testify. He said he knew nothing of the case and had only read a small portion of the testimony in the newspapers. After being duly instructed by the court, the witness went on to say that Mr. James Young had called on him with a little memorandum on a small bit of paper and had said he wanted to settle the transaction, which was for the sale of the 2,000 shares of the Chicago and Galena Union stock. The witness said he had sent his check for 500 shares at 90; the check was probably drawn to Boody's order; the price was about the market price of the stock at the time, but it fell afterward nearly one half. [The 500 shares, it may be mentioned, vaulted at $45,000, were given to Tilden as his share of the supposed profits, Tilden giving back a check for $19,000, thus leaving to his credit the $26,000, most of which, the plaintiff claims, was an overdraft.]

The cross-examination was conducted by Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, and was in great measure devoted to showing the intimate relations which existed between Mr. Boody and Mr. Tilden between 1859 and 1864, and to bringing into notice the numerous railroad "consolidations" in which the ex-reformer was engaged; thus the witness said he was consulted as counsel in the reorganization of the Chicago and North-western Railroad Company in 1859; he was employed as counsel in the creation of the new corporation, but was not its standing counsel; he acted for the bondholders of the old road; he acted only in certain special cases; he was also counsel for the Trustees of the first and second mortgage bonds of the Chicago, St. Paul and Fond du Lac Railroad Company, and conducted the proceedings under which the road was sold. He was not paid by the new corporation.

Here the witness suddenly became very talkative, and went on in his snuffling way to describe a great many matters having no possible pertinency to the case. His counsel, Mr. Niles, also began to talk, and there was soon a lively "spat" between him, the witness, and Mr. Hawkins. Then the witness began to explain his position, but Mr. Hawkins interrupted him by saying, "That duty is not upon you, Mr. Tilden, but with your counsel." "He's not my counsel," said Mr. Tilden, emphatically. "Well," retorted Mr. Hawkins, "he has acted as your counsel in this case." Mr. Tilden suddenly recollected himself and became silent for a while. After this, the witness, in response to further questions, said he had been Trustee under the first mortgage of the Chicago and North-western Railroad Company; he did not recollect, but thought it very likely that his office was at No. 12 Wall street at the time of the creation of the Consolidated Chicago and North-western Railroad Company; the office, very likely, was on the same floor—the second floor—of the building; Mr. Boody's office was at the same number.

"Was not Mr. Boody a Director of the railroad company at the time?" queried Mr. Hawkins. A.—There are better means of finding that out; I don't recollect.

Q.—Was he not a Director when his office was at the number? A.—Very likely.

The old corporation, the witness went on to say, was dissolved in 1859, and the new corporation was formed the same year; he did not remember whether he did much business for the new corporation; he did not do much business for it. Mr. Niles, who had been on his feet for some time, objecting to the line of examination, and who had worried the counsel for the plaintiff was here reproved by the court in a mild but firm manner, and sat down. Mr. Tilden began to wander off the line of his examination, and indulged in argument, and he too had to be checked by the court. The witness then went on to say he had probably been consulted by Mr. Ogden, and in subsequent years by the Executive Committee of the Chicago and North-western Company, of which Ogden was a member. Witness seemed to be rather anxious to show his payments, and said he would bring the books and show what he got paid. Mr. Hawkins said he did not care about going into private matters. During 1859, the witness resuming, said he was largely employed by Ogden personally. The road was sold in May or June, 1859. When questioned as to his services as counsel, the witness said, "My opinion is that after the new corporation was organized it had very little occasion for counsel for a considerable period." Ogden, he said, would come and talk to him at different times without regard to the relation of counsel and client. The witness was one of the purchasing committee of the Fond du Lac Road, but did not recollect meeting Boody in regard to the exchange of bonds in the reorganization. Witness had the impression that Boody was a Director of the road. He met the latter before and after Boody became a Director of the Chicago and North-western. The witness recollected something of the purchase of the Milwaukee and Horicon Railroad. It was not consolidated with the Chicago and North-western. The witness was asked whether he had bought some bonds of the road from Boody. Mr. Tilden said he submitted to the court this and nothing else with the subject. Judge Sedgwick, however, overruled the objection of the witness. The latter then said he never was in a pool in regard to that stock nor in regard to any other. He recollected nothing about the road, except that he had had some bonds and had sold them. He did not recollect meeting Boody in regard to the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company. He did not recollect that Boody was interested in it. Ogden had a few bonds of the company, but took no part in the transaction. The witness was one of the Purchasing Committee in its consolidation. In the reorganization of the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad the witness was Trustee for the bondholders and was a member of the Purchasing Committee. Witness did not know whether Boody was interested and did not recollect meeting him in it. The witness said he was quite sure Boody took no public part in the reorganization, and he then went on at great length to explain how the exchange of the bonds of the old corporation for the reorganized one was not done through him personally. Witness then said he was a Director for a short time in the Chicago and Alton and in the Pittsburg and Fort Wayne Roads. In the foreclosure and sale of the Terre Haute and Alton Railroad, the witness was counsel for the Trustees, and was a member of the Purchasing Committee.

This seemed to be a ticklish point with the witness who remonstrated in regard to the questions put to him. He told the court he saw no object in them except to affect other litigations. He was told he had nothing to fear on that score. The witness then said that Boody took a prominent part in the Chicago and North-western consolidation. The witness was not well posted on his relations with Boody in 1862, and did not recollect, while engaged in the Chicago and Alton matter, of going to Boody and getting the latter to allow a few shares of preferred and 1,000 of the common stock of the Chicago and Alton placed in his name. The witness was rather nettled by being asked whether he did not have an "operation" in the Rockford and Kenosha Railroad Company in the latter part of 1863. In response to the question he said at first the word "operation" was rather equivocal, and he desired to state that he was "not fond of pools. I never knew one," he remarked, "in which some one was not cheated, and as I don't propose to cheat myself, I prefer not to be one of the cheated." He said he had purchased some of the company's bonds, but could not tell the date of the purchase. The witness then turned to the court, and said that all these questions had no direct connection with the subject—an opinion in which Judge Sedgwick did not coincide. Ogden, continued the witness, had thought it expedient to acquire the Kenosha road, and to combine it with the North-western; Ogden had interested himself to get purchasers for the bonds; the witness was not a partner to the transaction; the foreclosure of the road was carried through after the purchase of the bonds. The witness thought he had attended the sale of the road at Rockford, but did not remember the nature of the transaction. After the sale, the road was united with the Chicago and North-western. The witness undoubtedly did something about the foreclosure, but did not remember whether as counsel he arranged the plan of consolidation; he could find out what services he had rendered by looking at his books and seeing whether he was paid for them. The witness understood Ogden was the manager; witness was a very busy man at this time; he was Trustee of the $6,000,000 consolidated mortgage issued by the Chicago and North-western Company in 1865, but did not know how many were sold through Boody; witness took 50 bonds, though he did not want them; he had no reason to suppose that Boody was the agent for the sale of any of the bonds; there was another class of bonds known as Equipment bonds, for the sale of which Boody may have been the agent. There was only a small quantity of them, amounting only to several hundreds of thousands of dollars. The witness' recollection was then called in succession to his connection with the construction of the Peninsular Railroad of Michigan, and to the Iron Cliffs Mine. The witness did not recollect borrowing in March, 1864, $80,000 from Boody without security and repaying the money five weeks later without any interest being asked or paid for its use. The operation at Brady's Bend, heretofore chronicled in THE TIMES, was then explained according to the witness view, and then the witness was examined again in regard to his connection with the Chicago and Galena Union operation. The witness said that Ogden's purpose in giving him 2,000 of the bonds was to limit his own risk. The witness recollected the panic of 1864 taking place while the operation in Galena Union was going on. Mr. Tilden tried hard to show that Secretary Chase "made the panic," but to his apparent disgust this attempt at elaborating on an irrelevant matter was ruled out. The witness then said he had never paid a dollar for even his 2,000 shares, but had an agreement to assume his loss on the shares. The witness said he had drawn the consolidation agreement, but he did not recollect whether payment for the work came from Boody. The witness went on: "Negotiations simmered to a close when I was not present, and the result was communicated to me; I don't remember the particulars; this was not one-tenth of my business. The witness was here shut off by the remark from the court that they did not care to know his private business.

Later on in the examination the witness, when questioned as to the liability he had assumed, said: "For me to share the losses of a pool is not only utterly untrue, but utterly and absolutely foreign to my entire character and habits; not only to my habits of mind and modes of thinking, but utterly impossible and totally untrue." The witness then went on at a great rate to give what every one supposed to be testimony, but which he wound up by remarking, "What I have stated was the necessary effect of the relation between Mr. Ogden and myself. I am something of a lawyer myself—"

Mr. Niles objected, and the witness was told to stop, Judge Sedgwick remarking that the witness should confine himself strictly to answering the questions put. All that was desired were the facts.

Mr. Tilden said he must fully answer.

Judge Sedgwick said: You have made them, several times repeated.

Mr. Tilden, (snappishly)—It seems to be necessary in this court, where such questions are allowed.

Judge Sedgwick rebuked the witness, and suggested to him that he himself knew that remarks which were not answers to questions were improper.

The witness was obliged to submit, and went on to say that Ogden had no control of the 2,000 shares referred to, and to venture on the opinion that he [witness] in receiving the $26,000 received about $1,000 less than he should have done.

Mr. Tilden left the witness stand about 3 P. M., apparently to the great relief of the court and counsel on both sides.

WASHINGTON'S DINNER.

A correspondent of the Boston Transcript relates the following: "Twenty to twenty-five years ago it was our pleasure to visit at times, an old homestead in Rhode Island, where lived in the household an old lady, since passed away at the ripe age of nearly 100 years. She took great pleasure in relating events in the early history of this country.

Her father kept for many years a country tavern in Rhode Island. At one time word came to them that Gen. Washington and his officers would arrive there on a given day and dine with them. They began immediately to make preparations to receive their distinguished visitors, and all were determined that the dinner should be the very best which could be provided. Game and delicacies in great variety were obtained without regard to trouble or expense. The day arrived, and Washington and his officers reached the tavern at the expected time. At the appointed hour for dinner the distinguished guests were invited into the dining-room, where their eyes fell upon tables loaded down and presenting, as the family all confidently felt, a most appetizing appearance. Washington and his officers were seated, members of the family were in attendance to wait upon them in the most polite and attentive manner. But great was their disappointment when Washington turned his head and spoke to her mother, and asked the question, 'Have you plenty of milk in the house?' Upon receiving an affirmative answer, he the said, 'If you can, I think you would give me a bowl of hasty-pudding and milk.' The hasty-pudding and milk were furnished, and of these he made his entire dinner. After dinner was over, one of the family in their disappointment said to Washington, 'Your work is so hard, we should suppose you would need something more hearty than hasty-pudding and milk for your dinner.' Immediately placing his hand upon his head he replied, 'Here is my work!'"

CONFESSION OF A MURDERER.

FRANK M'CONNOCHIE ADMITS THAT HE KILLED MAGGIE BAUER AND PLEADS MURDER IN THE SECOND DEGREE—HE IS SENTENCED TO PRISON AT HARD LABOR FOR LIFE.

The trial of Frank McConnochie for the murder of Maggie Bauer came to an unexpected termination yesterday morning by the solemn confession of the prisoner, to a responsible person, whose name is withheld, that he committed the murder. Immediately after the opening of the court Judge Busteed stated that, upon the most careful and searching investigation, followed by the most anxious reasoning of which he was capable, he had arrived at the conclusion that it was his duty to follow an entirely different course in his conduct of the case. The crime which had been committed on Aug. 14 had shocked the entire community, and the recital of the circumstances enveloping the terrible deed arrested reason in the exercise of its powers. The case rested upon purely circumstantial evidence, and the legal annals were filled with instances of convictions which had been obtained purely through circumstantial evidence, in which individuals had been convicted of crimes of the most shocking character and had expiated their crime, but had subsequently been proved innocent through the confession of the culprit. The counsel had started with the attempt to exclude the proof of the alleged confessions. One witness had testified that McConnochie had stated that he had not intended to kill the child, and if the court accepted that statement as evidence there could be no conviction, excepting in the second degree. On behalf of McConnochie, therefore, he proposed to withdraw his plea of "not guilty," and substitute for it a plea of "guilty of murder in the second degree."

District Attorney Downing said that if it could have been proved that the prisoner at the bar had committed the murder while in the full possession of his faculties and powers, it would undoubtedly have been a clear case of murder in the first degree, but he could not see that any good would result from the conviction of the prisoner of murder in the first degree, while the community was in doubt as to his sanity. From the testimony of the learned physicians, who had examined him, it was evident that the mind of the prisoner was weak, and he therefore concurred in the plea of the prisoner of murder in the second degree.

Judge Pratt said that the act of the counsel fully met with the approval of the court, as being not only a just but a wise disposition of the case, and it demonstrated the wisdom of the law. The unfortunate prisoner at the bar had been zealously and ably defended by counsel without reward or hope of reward, and had been prosecuted with a zeal highly proper on the part of the guardian of the people. From the testimony which had been adduced, he thought that there might well be a doubt in the minds of some of the jurors as to whether the prisoner was capable of committing one of the offenses at least with which he had been charged, and while he was satisfied that the course of the officers of the law in bringing the man to trial had been conducted with proper zeal, yet means had been adopted in some instances which the law could not tolerate, and a large portion of the testimony could not, therefore, go before the jury. Under these circumstances, the court considered it highly proper to accept the plea of guilty of murder in the second degree.

Judge Armstrong next pronounced sentence on the prisoner, which was that he be imprisoned for life in the Penitentiary at Sing Sing, at hard labor.

The prisoner regarded the proceedings up to this point with a vacant stare, but after sentence had been pronounced, the solemn faces worn by those around him, and the audible sobbing of Mrs. Bauer, aroused him to a sense of the gravity of his position, and he burst into a violent fit of weeping. The confession made by the prisoner was as follows:

"I grabbed Maggie Bauer as she was passing the corn-field; I then pushed and dragged her to the middle of the field, and to keep her from screaming, I clasped my hands around her throat; when I got her to the spot where she was found I threw her belt around her throat; I did this to keep her quiet, and did not mean to kill her; when I found what I had done I became frightened, and ran away, leaving her in a dying condition."

In response to the usual questions propounded by the Clerk, the prisoner said he was 29 years old; was born in Brooklyn; had no trade; was unmarried, and could not read or write.

DESCRIBING THEIR OWN INFAMY.

BOYD & CO. ON TRIAL ON A CHARGE OF DEFRAUDING THE GOVERNMENT—TESTIMONY OF JACOB REHM AND WILLIAM S. GOLSEN.

The case of the Government against F. O. Boyd & Co. was resumed yesterday before Judge Blatchford in the United States District Court. Jacob Rehm, the ex-Treasurer of the Chicago Whisky Ring, was the first witness. He gave his testimony in a free, off-hand manner, and disclosed much of the remarkably crooked conduct of those gentlemen who deal in and manufacture illicit whisky and other spirits. The Chicago Ring, he said, consisted of all the Western distillers and rectifiers, many Eastern dealers, and nearly all the Revenue officers and Deputy Collectors. As Treasurer of the Ring, he testified that he used to get a pool of money from the association, (including Hesing, who swore last Wednesday that he knew nothing of the crooked transactions,) and paid this money out to Revenue officers and Collectors in monthly payments of from $500 to $1,500. Mr. Rehm, of course, had a great deal of influence with the these officers of the Government, and whenever a distiller wanted an objectionable Inspector or gauger removed or transferred he (Rehm) used to go to the Collector and procure the desired change. The first of the Collectors who were such pliant tools of the Ring was Irwin, who died in the Fall of 1874, and then Wadsworth, who held the position down to the time of the grand break up in May of last year.

William S. Golsen was the second and last witness called for the Government during the day. This man was a dealer and rectifier of spirits in Chicago. He was indicted with Boyd & Co. for conspiracy to defraud the Government, but, having expressed a willingness to turn State's evidence, and make a clean breast of all he knew, the District Attorney entered a nolle prosequi in his case yesterday morning, and at once put him on the stand. During his examination a number of knotty points of law were raised by counsel, so that a great deal of the time was spent in arguing, and but little was elicited from the witness, who will be heard again next Monday. At one time Gen. Burnett, of counsel for the defendants, addressed the court some 10 or 15 minutes on an objection raised, and when he had done Judge Blatchford quietly remarked "that he had listened to some very entertaining general remarks, but was at a loss to see that any point had been raised for him to decide." This put the laugh on the General, who evidently failed to appreciate the matter as heartily as did those about him. Golsen's testimony was to the effect that he had shipped a large quantity of spirits to Boyd & Co., some of which was "straight," but more "crooked." The packages of the former was marked "B," while the latter article bore the letter "C." For disposing of the "crooked" article the witness had paid Boyd & Co. an extra commission of $2 a barrel. When the spirits were received at the warehouse of Mr. Golsen he used to empty it all—crooked and straight—into a large cistern, so that when the stuff was sold it was mixed up and of course all went off as straight and was shipped under his own marks as the manufacturer. Some of the barrels sent to Boyd & Co. were marked "P. C.," and the question as to the meaning of these letters having been asked, Judge Blatchford remarked that it was doubtless "particularly crooked" or possibly "pure cologne." Mr. Golsen unblushingly acknowledged that he used to take the stamps off the packages received at his warehouse from distilleries and return them to the distillers for use again, some of them being used as many as five times, although as a rule they were used but twice.

The case will be resumed next Monday morning.

THE PEARSALL WILL CASE.

The contest over the will of the late Walter Pearsall, who was a Fulton Market fish-dealer, and who died about two years ago, was concluded yesterday before Surrogate Calvin. On the death of the testator he left half of his property (the estate was valued at $100,000) to his wife, with whom he had lived very unhappily for several years. On the will being offered for probate, Miss Eliza Jane Pearsall, an alleged daughter by a former marriage, presented another "last will and testament," which provided that all the property of the deceased, both real and personal, should be left to her, and that she should be the sole Executrix. This document was drawn by one William Korff, who was subsequently indicted for perjury in the case, and forfeited his bail. His testimony was all stricken out, and some half dozen adjournments were obtained by counsel for the contestant on the ground that important evidence would be introduced in the place of that so thrown out. This was never done, however. Yesterday the counsel on both sides summed up and submitted the case to the Surrogate, who reserved his decision.

PRISON MANAGEMENT.

The Superintendent of State Prisons, Louis D. Pillsbury, stated yesterday that the appointment or removal of all the subordinates under the Warden of Sing Sing Prison would be subject to the discretion of the latter official, and in case the Warden deemed such changes necessary to the improvement of the management of the prison, he was fully authorized to make them. Mr. A. J. Buglin, the principal keeper, was reappointed to that position. Mr. Buglin has introduced the "silent system," and now no convict is allowed to speak to another even at meals or otherwise. The convicts are also so separated that two of them will at no time be together. No other changes were made by Warden Clarke yesterday. After a brief sojourn at Sing Sing Prison, Superintendent Pillsbury intends to visit Auburn Prison, and it is rumored that Robert H. Anderson, the recently-elected State Prison Inspector, will be appointed Warden of that institution.

THE INSURANCE COMPLICATIONS.

FURTHER EXAMINATION INTO THE AFFAIRS OF THE CONTINENTAL LIFE—TESTIMONY OF A FORMER DIRECTOR AS TO THE MISMANAGEMENT OF THE CONCERN—MRS. HONE'S RAILROAD BONDS.

The hearing in the matter of the Continental Life Insurance Company before the Referee, Mr. William Allen Butler, was resumed yesterday at No. 20 Nassau-street, and brought out some very strong testimony as to how the affairs of that concern were managed, or rather mismanaged, by its former officers.

The first witness called was Mr. James B. Colgate, formerly a member of the Board of Directors. He was examined at length by Mr. Raphael J. Moses, of counsel, regarding the annuities that were paid to some of the officers, and testified that he heard of a proposition to pay them 5 per cent. in addition to their salaries, but he strongly disapproved of such a course; witness had never understandingly voted for such a proposition; he had resigned his position as a Director for several reasons, among them the annuity plan. Counsel called the witness' attention to a meeting of the Finance Committee held in January, 1872, at which he introduced a resolution favoring the withdrawal from the Loaners' Bank of the money then on deposit there, and witness said he remembered the circumstance; he told them they had no right to keep the funds of the company there, to which they replied that she bank paid them 3 per cent.; witness said he would give them 5 per cent. and good collateral security; after Mr. Frost became President of the company, witness went to him and begged him to have nothing to do with the Loaners' Bank, as the company would lose by it. Mr. Frost, in reply, stated that the reason they kept the money there was that the bank paid them $5,000 rent for the premises occupied by it, and some of the Directors in the Continental were also Directors in the bank. Mr. Colgate was then asked if he remembered having sent a letter to the Board of Directors which was read at their meeting on Oct. 4, 1872, in which he tendered his resignation, and requested that his name be dropped from the circulars, &c., issued by the company; he replied that he did, and added that it had been his desire for some time previous to resign, because he thought his advice and counsel were not needed; he had been a member of the Finance Committee, and was dropped from that; subsequently he was a member of the Auditing Committee, and was dropped from that; again he had been deceived by the President, whom he had spoken to concerning the funds of the institution; that officer had stated to him that a large amount of money was deposited with the Market Bank; the same day witness discovered that this money was deposited in the Market Savings Bank, a bankrupt institution, he called on Mr. Frost, and told him that he would submit to that kind of management no longer; he afterward learned that the Empire Mutual Life Insurance Company had been reinsured in the Continental without any consultation with the Directors. "Putting all these things together," said the witness, "I thought it was about time for me to quit." The annual statements of the company, Mr. Colgate said, were read to the Directors, but he never suspected anything wrong about them until on one occasion, shortly before the death of Mr. Justus Lawrence, that gentleman, while reading one of these statements to the board, called off among the assets the item of "real estate, $700,000." The witness asked what real estate was held by the company, and Mr. Lawrence replied their own building; this, witness knew, had only cost $500,000, and he therefore concluded that the statement was suspicious; he knew nothing about the purchase of the capital stock by three of the Directors, as testified to by Mr. Wynkoop; nor did he ever have the slightest suspicion that his stock was purchased with money loaned by the company for that purpose.

The next witness was Mr. Marvin E. Parrott, the former Claim Agent of the Company, who submitted a list of the pending claims against the company. A contract made and signed on April 6, 1874 between the company and the witness, was then produced and shown to him, according to the terms of which, he was to receive an annual salary of $4,500, and 5 per cent. additional on all the money which he could succeed in saving to the company; witness could not remember the amount of money he had received under the per cent. clause in the contract, but thought it amounted to about $1,500 a year during 1874 and 1875; this money he received for his own use, and no portion of it was divided with anybody.

Mr. E. P. Tucker, the Actuary, who made the official examination of the affairs of the New-Jersey Mutual, was next called to the stand, and testified that he made a list of the bonds and mortgages among the assets of that institution which were presented to him by Jeremiah H. Stedwell, the President; this list was filed in the office of the Secretary of State. The object of this inquiry, Mr. Moses stated, was to show from the list, of which he had procured a copy, that the securities transferred by the Continental to the New-Jersey were among them. The further hearing was then adjourned.

Apart from the regular reference, the matter of the petition of Mrs. Elizabeth Hone, which had also been referred to Mr. Butler, was then taken up. The testimony showed that the petitioner was the holder of five $1,000 bonds of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company. These she placed in the custody of a man named Laing for safe keeping, and on applying to him for them was informed that two of them were in the safe of a down-town broker. She put no faith in this story, and subsequent inquiries at the office of the company disclosed the fact that they were in the possession of the Continental Life Insurance Company, and she now seeks their recovery. It appears that the bonds were held by the Loaners' Bank, where the Continental had on deposit $43,000, and at the time of the failure of the former these bonds were transferred to the latter as security for a part of that amount.

Mr. Henry D. Walker, the Treasurer of the National Capitol Life Insurance Company, stated yesterday to a reporter of THE TIMES, that the statement published on Thursday, to the effect that criminal proceedings were instituted against Benjamin Noyes, the President of that company, was untrue. It appears that the person indicted was Daniel J. Noyes, who acted as counsel for the New-Jersey Mutual Company.

A YOUTHFUL WANDERER FROM INDIANA.

Yesterday afternoon a policeman found a lad, about 13 years of age, who gave his name as Valentine Greer, wandering along Second-avenue. On being questioned he said he came to the City from Indiana in search of his mother, Mrs. Charles Acker, residing at No. 330 East Eighty-first-street. The officer brought the lad to the Central Office, where he was cared for by Mrs. Webb, the Matron. He said that in 1874, his mother, at that time a widow and very poor, placed him in the Juvenile Asylum, whence he was subsequently sent West, and found a home with Simeon Dowell, a farmer, living at Hopestan, Ill. He was kindly treated, but was required to work very hard for a boy of his tender years. Dowell removed to Jasper County, Ind., taking Valentine with him. Dowell then commenced to treat the boy so harshly that he determined to run away. In September last he made his way to Francesville, secreted himself in a freight car and rode to Lafayette. He was entirely penniless, but he fared well on his travels until he reached Alleghany, where, at his own request, he spent one month in the poor-house. After being discharged he continued his travels, stealing rides on railroad trains and sleeping in Police stations, and stopping at Altoona, Harrisburg, and Philadelphia. At Philadelphia Mayor Stokley supplied him with a pass, and he arrived in this City on Thursday afternoon. The Police are in search of his mother.

THE PROPOSED CARNIVAL.

The following notice was presented to the Police Board yesterday by Col. William St. Martin, the "Earl Grand Marshal" of the proposed carnival:

NEW-YORK, Feb. 23, 1877.

To the Board of Police:

THE PRESIDENTIAL COUNT.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES.

PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—FILLIBUSTERING EFFORTS BY THE DEMOCRATS—A REPUBLICAN'S POINT OF ORDER SUSTAINED BY SPEAKER RANDALL—NO DELAYS TO BE PERMITTED—THE VOTE OF OREGON COUNTED FOR HAYES—RECESS TILL MONDAY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—The vote of Oregon was counted in joint meeting of the two houses to-day. This progress, though not great, was better than could reasonably be expected, considering the caucus action of yesterday afternoon, and the exhibition of Democratic spirit last night. The Senate and House reassembled at 10 o'clock this morning, and the Senate immediately sent to the House a message announcing their readiness to proceed with the count. In the House Mr. McMahon, of Ohio, offered the caucus resolution setting the hour of 1 o'clock for the joint meeting. Some points of order were made, and finally Mr. Randall admitted a substitute for McMahon's resolution, which Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, offered, declaring that the House was ready to meet the Senate forthwith. The yeas and nays were called on this substitute, and it was adopted by a vote of 145 to 87. This was an unexpected defeat to the filibustering faction, and the announcement of the vote was followed by great excitement in the House and an amusing display of activity on the part of David Dudley Field and his runners. Messrs. Springer and Vance were conspicuously active running about the House to get votes changed, or to secure pledges of votes for the next roll-call. Mr. Vance's activity is stimulated by his desire to secure the office of Public Printer, which it is understood has been promised to him substantially by the Tilden managers. He has earned this office by the defeat which he suffered as a candidate for re-election on account of a payment made by him, as Chairman of the Committee on Printing, to a country miller in Ohio, ostensibly as an expert in printing, but really to aid him to come to Washington on a pleasure trip. Mr. Vance as Public Printer has thus indicated his capacity to fill the office with millers, and, doubtless, grocers, and organ-grinders, without much regard to how the printing would be accomplished. The activity of the filibustering party was not fruitful, for on the next roll-call, being on a motion to lay on the table, a motion to reconsider the vote on Mr. Wilson's resolution, the yeas were 175, and the nays 74. This ended the attempt to delay the joint meeting, and a few minutes before 12 the Senate came into the House. The decision of the Commission was read and the objections presented, and the two houses separated again about 12:10.

After the Senate retired from the hall of the House, the first real test vote upon the policy of delay was taken, the motion being a recess until 10 o'clock Monday morning. Mr. Clymer offered this resolution, and undertook to say that it was proposed in entire good faith, and without any purpose to filibuster; but there were several objections to debate, and he was not permitted to go on. Mr. Hancock, of Texas, made the point of order which was made by Mr. Hale on the first occasion of the attempt to take a recess, to the effect that the law required the House to proceed at once to decide the objections without taking a recess. This point of order was again overruled by Mr. Randall, and the vote recurred directly upon Mr. Clymer's motion. In speaking on the point of order, Mr. Hancock took pains to say that he was disappointed at the defeat, but hoped he had manhood enough to continue to do his duty as a member of the House. Mr. Clymer replied to this that the question was not one of manhood, but of order, and afterward attempted to make some remarks, which were not heard in the gallery, owing to confusion on the floor. The vote was taken by yeas and nays, and the proposal for a recess was lost by a vote of 112 yeas to 158 nays. Mr. Lane, of Oregon, immediately attempted the scheme of filibustering by repeated roll-calls, and offered a motion to take a recess until 9:30 on Monday morning. Mr. Hale made the point of order that this was a dilatory motion, and not in order to be offered in the House under the provisions of the Electoral law. To the surprise of the floor and the galleries, Mr. Randall immediately sustained the point of order, saying that it was not in order when the Constitution of the United States and the law enacted under it required Congress to do a certain thing that any obstruction be offered to the performance of the act, and that Mr. Lane's motion was of the class of dilatory motions, and was not in order.

The ruling was rather arbitrary, in the light of Mr. Randall's previous rulings in the same direction, for Mr. Lane's motion was no more designed for delay than was the motion of Mr. Clymer, which was admitted to be in order. But the distinction made by Mr. Randall that the House having by a decided vote refused to take the recess which, according to his ruling, was in order, it was very clearly indicated that their purpose to go on with the count and the calling of the roll for the sake of delay was a species of filibustering which the country would not tolerate. The decision was loudly and properly applauded on the Republican side of the house, for it was exactly in accordance with law and right, if not altogether consistent with the action of Mr. Randall a few days since, when he kept the Secretary of the Senate waiting nearly an hour with a message to the House, refusing to recognize him to deliver it. This ruling of Mr. Randall, if persisted in, defeats absolutely the power of the revolutionary element to prevent the conclusion of the count before next Saturday. They can cause considerable delay and trouble, and take up much time that ought to be devoted to legislation, but if a majority adhere to the refusal to take unnecessary recesses, and Mr. Randall refuse to permit motions intended to waste the time of the House in roll calls, there can be no method of delay which cannot be overcome by diligence in attending to the counting of the vote.

The defeat of McMahon's resolution was followed by the two hours' discussion on the resolution sustaining the decision of the Commission. The debate was for the most part dull and spiritless, except that it was enlivened by two or three interesting incidents. The fact is that the general subject of the Presidential contest has grown stale, and the ten-minute manuscript speeches which were prepared by nearly all the members have been used up in the previous debates, and nobody of much importance cares to speak. John Young Brown made one of his characteristic speeches, of which he makes few in the House, his speech to-day being the first of much importance since his famous attack on Ben Butler in the last Congress. He was full of Southern fire, and above all things repudiated the idea that there was any possibility of a coalition between any faction of the Southern Democrats and the Republican Administration of President Hayes. The Democratic Party was only divided on the question of the hour, and would be a unit on all questions of public policy after the Presidential contest had been decided. He stood manfully by the bill, and submitted to defeat.

Mr. Hewitt made his promised attack on Commissioner Hoar, charging him with bad faith, though in rather mild terms, which indicated that Hewitt was not quite certain of the ground on which he stood. He was cut off at the end of the 10 minutes with what he deemed the most important part of his manuscript unread. If his charge against Mr. Hoar had any point, it was simply that in his speech in the House, on the Electoral bill, Mr. Hoar had used the word "proof" in a way which Mr. Hewitt seemed to think required him to vote that evidence was to be considered by the Commission. Mr. Hoar replied in a sharp speech, first reading from a former speech of Mr. Bayard, in which he declared in the most absolute terms against Congress having any power to investigate an election for President, and claimed that bad faith could no more be imputed to himself than to Mr. Bayard, who had changed his opinion honestly, no doubt. Mr. Hoar stated that on this question of the admissibility of evidence himself and Mr. Hewitt had disputed two or three days in the committee, taking opposite sides, and it was absolutely understood that the question was to be submitted unconditionally to the Commission. Mr. Hoar's application to Hewitt of Webster's characterization of Ingersoll many years ago, that there was a screw loose in his mind, and not only one, but that the whole machinery was out of order and crazy, was loudly cheered by the House. Mr. Hewitt has become a kind of lunatic on the subject of the Presidency, and is incapable of forming any judgment or stating truthfully any fact.

When the Senate returned to its own Chamber after the division on Oregon, Mr. Sargent offered a resolution to the effect that the decision of the Commission be sustained. Mr. Kelly opposed this with much more vehemence than discretion. He was followed shortly after by his colleague, Senator Mitchell, who, in a very clear and forcible argument, proved, among other things, that Kelly was not quite so well informed regarding the statute law of Oregon as he should be. Senator Merrimon, who spoke next, made a long speech, which was principally devoted to a consideration of the Florida case. It was a very fine effort in its way, but came a little too late in the day to be effective. Mr. Morton, in his usual matter-of-fact style, clearly stated the question before the Senate, and then argued that not only right and justice, but every technicality of the law, demanded that the verdict of the Electoral tribunal should be approved and sustained. He contended further, that the duty of the Governor of Oregon, under the laws of that State, was purely a ministerial one. He was required to issue certificates of election to those persons who had received the highest number of votes. He was not a returning officer, and had no right to decide what persons had been chosen, or to determine who was eligible or ineligible.

Mr. Conkling took the floor after Senator Morton, and as he has not taken any part in the recent debate on the contested States, and is not on the record regarding them, his address was listened to with marked attention. He said that according to his understanding, the Joint Commission had sent two papers to the houses which required attention. One of them was the decision in the Oregon case, and the other the reasons upon which that decision was based. To avoid all misapprehension which might occur touching his position in the matter, he desired to say distinctly that he believed the vote of Oregon had been given to the Republican candidates, and he would vote to sustain the decision. He did not understand, however, that by such action he would be voting for or advocating the reasons assigned for the verdict. He said, in conclusion, that he was very anxous for the count to go on, and desiring to throw no obstacle in the way of its rapid progress, he would refrain from further remarks.

Mr. Saulsbury, who was the next speaker, had a great deal to say about Louisiana, and stated with considerable warmth that he did not believe there had been any intimidation or violence in that State. He was unable to show, however, why the vote of Oregon should be given to the distinguished correspondent of Gobble & Company. The next gentleman to address the Senate was Senator Bogy, who said in a blood-curdling tone, and with an air of high tragedy, that he wanted to enter his solemn protest against the counting of the vote of Oregon for Hayes and Wheeler. He warned the galleries that there were dark days coming, requested them to remember Augustus of Rome, and then sat down, evidently well pleased with his little effort.

Mr. Whyte, who was the next protesting Democrat, said he had been deceived by the men who had framed the bill preparing for the establishment of the Commission. He thought that a court, constituted as the Electoral tribunal was, would give a fair and impartial decision, but he was disappointed. Senator Kernan, who spoke soon after, referred to a casual remark which Mr. Mitchell had made regarding ex-Gov. Tilden, and said he thought it was very wrong for any one to say a word against that gentleman. Then little Mr. Eaton, of Connecticut, took the floor, and created quite a stir by announcing that at some future date he would discuss the Oregon case at length. Unfortunately for those who are obliged to attend the meetings of the Senate, there is good reason to believe that he was not joking. His speech to-day very forcibly reminded some of those present of the address he made in 1861, when he swore that the soldiers of Massachusetts should never march through Connecticut to the South, except over the dead bodies of all faithful Democrats. He declared, to-day, among other things of the same sort, that if he had the power of the lower house of Congress he would, as God was his judge, prevent the count from going on. It will be remembered that Mr. Eaton was the only Democratic Senator who voted against the Electoral Count bill. When he concluded his oration this afternoon, Pullitzer, the German adventurer who tried to ruin his benefactor, Carl Schurz, rushed up to his seat, and, shaking his hand with a great display of satisfaction, warmly congratulated him. Shortly afterward, while Senator Jones, of Florida, was making a speech against the resolution, Pullitzer sat at his elbow, with a number of books of reference, and frequently prompted him. No one seems to know upon what authority this person makes himself so important in a chamber which is supposed to be reserved for Senators and a few high officials. It is suggested, however, that Senator Jones has retained him as his Private Secretary.

At the conclusion of the Jones-Pullitzer address a vote was taken on a substitute for Senator Sargent's resolution, and it was lost, yeas 24, nays 40. Then the original resolution, sustaining the action of the Commission, was adopted by a vote of 40 to 24. After the two houses had voted on the objections to sustaining the decision of the Commission in the Oregon case, there was a second joint meeting, and the vote of Oregon was counted for Hayes and Wheeler.

The next State on the list was Pennsylvania. When the returns were opened the demand was made by Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, and Mr. Springer, that they should be read in full. Meantime Mr. Cochrane went about the House getting signatures to a bogus objection to votes of certain Electors in that State; and having obtained a sufficient number, the document was presented, and the two houses were compelled to separate.

Immediately after the departure of the Senate, Mr. Vance, of Ohio, offered a resolution for a recess till Monday morning at 10 o'clock. The roll-call was watched with great interest, and the vote on both sides was nearly the same, till, finally, when the reading of the names of those voting began, the resolution was beaten by five or six votes. After the reading, several more votes were given, and five or six Democrats changed from nay to yea, and the motion was at last carried by 133 yeas to 121 nays. This was a small vote, but it was late, and many members neglectful of public duties had gone home to dinner. Only a few Democrats voted against a recess, and the excuse that some of them offer is that they felt they had forced the David Dudley-Springer filibusterers as far as was prudent for one day. The objections to the Pennsylvania count will be the first thing to be taken up on Monday morning.

After returning to its own chamber, the Senate at once took up the consideration of the Pennsylvania objections. It was supported by Mr. Wallace, while Senators Cameron and Morton in pointed address showed how utterly idle and ridiculous it was. In addition to this, Mr. Morton drew attention to the fact that in Virginia there was a Democratic Elector named Hardin, who was also a Centennial Commissioner, and he argued that if the vote of Morrill was illegal his [Hardin's] was no better. After some further discussion of no importance the objection was overruled by an almost unanimous vote, and then the Senate, having been informed of the action of the House, took a recess until Monday morning.

AN IMPORTANT VOTE ANALYZED.

MR. CLYMER'S MOTION TO TAKE A RECESS—HOW AND BY WHOM IT WAS DEFEATED—ONE-THIRD OF THOSE WHO VOTED FOR DELAY REJECTED BY THEIR CONSTITUENTS AT THE LAST ELECTION.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—The following is an analysis of the vote on Mr. Clymer's motion for a recess until Monday, which was taken prior to the assembling of the joint convention to receive the decision of the Commission in the case of Oregon. The vote stood for the recess, 112; against recess, 158. Of the votes against recess, 49 were Democrats, and of those 17 were Southern men. Five New-York Democrats voted for recess, namely: John H. Bagley, Bliss, Cox, Field, and Odell. Meade dodged, and Schumaker was absent. The New-York Democrats who voted against recess were Beebe, Hewitt, Lord, Metcalf, Walker, Ward, Whitehouse, Willis, and Wood. The vote for recess was distributed as follows: Alabama, 3; Arkansas, 3; California, 2; Connecticut, 2; Florida, 1; Georgia, 4; Illinois, 6; Indiana, 5; Iowa, 1; Kentucky, 5; Louisiana, 2; Maryland, 5; Massachusetts, 2; Mississippi, 4; Missouri, 8; New-Jersey, 2; New-York, 5; North Carolina, 6; Ohio, 10; Oregon, 1; Pennsylvania, 13; Tennessee, 9; Virginia, 6; West Virginia, 2; Wisconsin, 3; total, 112. Of the 10 representatives from Tennessee, one only is a Republican, and the nine Democrats voted solid for recess, this being the only State having more than one Democratic Representative where the delegation was solid. Of the six Democrats from Texas only one voted for recess. The Democracy of Pennsylvania and Ohio came near being solid; of the 18 from Pennsylvania, 13 voted yea, one was absent, and Randall did not assert his constitutional right to vote, as he did when the Electoral bill was passed by the House. Seven of the 13 who voted yea were defeated for re-election. Of the 13 Ohio Democrats, 10 voted yea, and of these, eight will not be on the rolls of the next Congress, and one of them, Banning, may be rubbed off. Of the entire number of those voting for recess, 38, or one-third, were defeated at the polls last year, and of the 38 thus defeated 26 are from Northern and Western States.

ANOTHER DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS.

A PART OF THE MEMBERS IN CONSULTATION—DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S FOLLOWERS—PREARRANGED PLANS AGREED UPON—GENERAL DISCUSSION INDULGED IN.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—The Democrats, or a part of them, held another caucus to-night. There were, so far as can be learned, no more than 70 or 80 members present, and they were, with perhaps a half-dozen exceptions, the men who are operating under the command of David Dudley Field to defeat the count of the Electoral vote. David Dudley has secretly got the approval of his Committee on the Privileges and Powers of the House for the two bills which he explained in caucus last night. One is to provide for a President ad interim, and the other for a new election next Fall. These bills he presented to the caucus again to-night, and he was authorized to present them in the House. He will try to antagonize them to the continuation of the count on Monday; but Mr. Vance made a motion to-day to instruct Field's committee to find out what the House can do under the circumstances, and Mr. Randall ruled it out of order. Mr. Field's bills cannot be introduced except during a legislative session of the House, and that cannot be held till after the Commission takes up the case of South Carolina. The caucus was a fixed up affair, and the probability of the House following any action agreed upon to-night may be judged by the way in which the caucus action of last night, which was much better attended, was broken away from in the first vote. There was no opposition in the caucus, because only those were there who went to do the thing that was done. Many Democrats were about the hotels during the evening, who said they remained away from the caucus purposely. The prospect to-night is that the count will be finished in accordance with law, but not till near the end of next week.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

After the House had to-day taken a recess until Monday, a Democratic caucus was announced for to-night at 7:30 o'clock. At that hour about 75 members were present. Some of those who favored dilatory proceedings in the Electoral count were absent, as they were dissatisfied with the action of the majority of their party to-day in voting to continue the count, while those who were in favor of continuing the count did not care to meet with those of opposite views. The object of the caucus, however, had no reference to the proceedings of the House regarding the count, but with regard to the law of 1792, which provides that, in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate, or, if there is none, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, shall act as President until the disability is removed or a President elected. It was contended in the caucus that, should there be no declaration before the 4th of March of the election of a President based on the Electoral returns, there would be no such vacancy as contemplated by the law, and therefore provision should be made for such a contingency.

Representative Field stated that he had prepared a bill to meet the contingency, which he explained. After some discussion, the caucus adopted a resolution instructing the Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House to report on Monday, or at the earliest practicable moment, Mr. Field's bill, providing that in case there be no election of President and Vice President under the count of the Electoral vote, the President of the Senate shall assume the functions of President, and a new election is to be held at a time to be fixed by the committee. The resolution further instructs the committee to report Mr. Fields' bill, providing for quo warranto proceedings before the United States Supreme Court with reference to the final settlement of the Presidential question, the Electoral bill containing no definite provision regarding the subject.

There was also some general discussion relative to the disposal of points of order that may arise during the further count of the Electoral vote, but no resolutions on this point were adopted, and the caucus, at 9:15 P. M., adjourned.

WASHINGTON NOTES.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—The House Committee on Appropriations this morning unanimously agreed to recommend non-concurrence in the Senate amendment to the Postal Appropriation bill, which proposes granting subsidies for the China mail service and for the line from New-Orleans to Brazil. Messrs. Holman, Blount, and Foster, who were subsequently appointed as the House members of the Conference Committee on this bill, are all understood to be opposed to the provision for subsidies, which are, therefore, not likely to be finally retained in the bill.

The President is giving his attention to-day to private business only, and has given audience to no visitors.

The receipts of national bank notes for the week ending Feb. 24, as compared with the corresponding week of last year, were as follows:

	1876.	1877.
New-York	$1,264,000	$781,000
Boston	1,483,000	1,240,000
Philadelphia	64,000	126,000
Miscellaneous	1,030,000	1,154,000
Total	$3,843,000	$3,251,000
The receipts for one day were		$419,000

The receipts from internal revenue to-day were $587,712, and from Customs $358,385.

National bank circulation outstanding this date $317,935,727, of which $1,428,920 is in national gold notes.

The President to-day sent the following nominations of Postmasters to the Senate: William H. Craig, at Albany, N. Y.; William Brujan, Hudson, N. Y.; W. D. Cooke, Southington, Conn.; Charles B. Loop, Belvidere, Ill.; Mrs. Priscilla Wilson, Braidwood, Ill.; William W. Freeman, Menasha, Wis.; Alonzo Shaw, Tipton, Iowa; N. C. Boles, Hutchinson, Kan.; W. H. Kennon, Columbus, Miss. Hon. Daniel J. Morrill, of Jamestown, Penn., testified before the Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House to-day that he was appointed United States Centennial Commissioner, by the President, under the Act of March 3, 1871, and still held that office, which was one of honor and trust, but no profit. He said he did not attend the meeting of the Electoral College, because he had been informed of his ineligibility, and Mr. Henry A. Boggs was appointed by the college to fill the vacancy. Before the same committee to-day the examination of William K. Spearing, of New-Orleans, was continued, and he testified in relation to the meetings of himself, Gifford, and Littlefield, corroborating the latter's testimony given yesterday in every essential particular. He also testified with reference to his, Littlefield's, and Murphy's trip to Springfield, Ill., and their interview there with Gov. Palmer, all of which has already been made public. He stated that he had no promise of money or any other reward for his trouble and services, and acted solely from a desire for and with a view to securing a good government for his State. Hon. E. J. Ellis, member of Congress from Louisiana, testified that Duncan F. Kenner's standing as a gentleman of character and social position was of the very highest, and whose reputation for integrity and truth was beyond all cavil; he did not believe that Mr. Kenner would offer a bribe to any one; as to J. Madison Wells his reputation was very bad, and witness would not believe him under oath in any matter in which his [Wells] pecuniary interest or his party interest should come into play.

The committee then adjourned until Monday.

While sitting in the cloak-room of the Senate, smoking, to-day, Senator Hamlin was taken with what appeared to be a fainting fit, and had it not been for Senator McMillan, who sat by him, would have fallen into the fire. He soon recovered, but his friends thought it best that he be taken home. After arriving there he soon recovered, and this evening is in his usual good health.

About 11 o'clock this morning a rumor gained circulation that an attempt would be made when the Senate passed in procession through the rotunda, on its way to the House, to seize the two mahogany boxes containing Electoral returns, carried by Capt. Bassett, Assistant Doorkeeper of the Senate, in order to prevent any further count. But little credence was attached to the report; but Capt. Blackford, Chief of the Capitol Police, placed an additional number of policemen in the rotunda during the passage, both ways, of the Senatorial procession. No attempt was made, however, and probably none was intended.

The following were the balances in the Treasury at the close of business to-day: Currency, $9,055,792; special deposit of legal tenders for redemption of certificates of deposit, $38,590,000; coin, $90,150,663, including coin certificates, $52,738,400; outstanding legal tenders, $364,984,810.

Secretary Morrill continues to improve, and is able to sit up for a short time. The President called this morning and had an hour's conference with him.

To-day Judge Cartter, on the petition of Charles L. Steever and others, by Mr. Fullerton, directed a rule to issue on the Secretary of the Navy, returnable on Saturday next, to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued to compel him to pay them certain prize money. They state that under Lieut. William B. Cushing, on the 27th of October, 1864, they captured the rebel ram Albermarle; that, under the decree of the court of August 21, 1865, and Feb. 11, 1873, the petitioners were entitled to a share in the prize money ($273,135 09), their share being $34,866 40, and state that the amount was not fairly proportioned, and the sum of $23,925 has been paid; that this wrong was brought to the notice of the Secretary soon after its discovery, May 5, 1873.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT IN KENTUCKY.

The engineer saw the danger in time to avoid a serious disaster. Two passengers were slightly injured, W. H. Moore, of Memphis, had his shoulder partly dislocated, and a Mr. Cochran, of New-Orleans, had two ribs broken. No interruption to travel was occasioned by the accident.

LATEST NEWS BY CABLE.

THE EASTERN CAMPAIGN.

AN AGREEMENT BETWEEN TURKEY AND SERVIA—THE ASSEMBLING OF PERSIAN TROOPS EXPLAINED—RUSSIA'S ATTITUDE TOWARD ENGLAND—THE CZAR'S ARMY IN FINE CONDITION.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Feb. 24.—An agreement between the Porte and the Servian Envoys was concluded to-day. Prince Milan will address a letter to the Sultan accepting the Turkish conditions, except those claiming equality for the Jews in Servia and the right of the Porte to be diplomatically represented at Belgrade. The Sultan will grant Prince Milan a new firman determining the future relations of Servia and Turkey.

The Persian Minister has communicated to the Sultan a dispatch from the Shah explaining that the assemblages of troops on the Turkish frontier are solely meant to prevent the depredations of a nomadic tribe. These assemblages have been ordered to cease.

BRUSSELS, Feb. 24.—Le Nord to-day publishes a letter from St. Petersburg declaring that England will obtain no concession from Russia short of an agreement for the coercion of Turkey. In case the Porte persists in its refusal to execute reforms, England's present attitude might even precipitate Russia's decision to abandon a position which is neither peace nor war, yet imposes upon Russia all war's sacrifices.

LONDON, Feb. 24.—A special dispatch from Berlin says: "It is stated in well-informed circles that the Czar will certainly await the powers' replies to Prince Gortschakoff's circular before attacking Turkey." A Prussian officer just arrived from Kischeneff gives a highly favorable account of the Russian Army, but it is positively asserted that Russia in no case will commence hostilities before March 31.

COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL.

LONDON, Feb. 24.—The depression in the Mincing-lane markets continues, and quotations have further given way. Plantation Ceylon and East India new crop coffee are about 4 shillings to 5 shillings per cwt. lower than last Friday's prices, owing to arrivals and full supplies expected. Pale descriptions have not varied much in price. Sugar, after receding 1 shilling per cwt. in many cases, closed steadier. The Glasgow market closes quiet, with prices barely supported, but the week's transactions show an advance of 1 shilling to 1 shilling 6 pence per cwt., the principal gain being on medium descriptions. A few cargoes of new Burmah rice sold, to arrive, at about last week's prices. There have been exceptionally heavy public sales of tea, prices in some cases favoring buyers. Lower grades of red-leaf Congou were most depressed. The private-contract market was dull as usual. The only feature in spices has been some inquiry for black and white pepper, to arrive.

Business on the Stock Exchange during the week has been very dull. Consols are ¼ better on the week. A majority of foreign securities have declined. Russians, however, are in demand in consequence of repurchases by speculators for a fall who were alarmed by the pacific tone of the German Emperor's speech. Canadian railways are dull and lower. American Governments are steady, but some railways, including Erie, are flat at a reduction. Telegraphs have generally declined. Anglo-American are 3 and Direct United States ½ to ¾ worse in consequence of the announcement of the shilling tariff.

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

VIENNA, Feb. 24.—A conference of the constitutional party of the Reichsrath to-day resolved that the Government plan for the formation of the bank's Board of Directors is not inadmissible, nevertheless the party reserves freedom of action upon the compromise proposals, especially regarding the appointment of Vice Governors of the bank as an open question.

BILBAO, Feb. 24.—Tempestuous weather has been prevalent here during the last few days, and still continues. One English and two French ships are reported to be lost at Santona with all hands.

LONDON, Feb. 24.—Seven of the seamen belonging to the bark Peti Dubrovacki, which was wrecked on St. Kilda Island, are supposed to have perished.

SLAVERY IN CUBA.

HAVANA, Feb. 24.—The Voz de Cuba, referring to President Grant's Message and his statement that Cuba is the only land in which slavery now exists, says: "While slavery on a larger scale exists in Brazil, the Spanish law of gradual abolition will result in ending slavery in Cuba earlier than in Brazil. If foreign Governments insist that slavery be abolished in Brazil while it exists in Cuba, then let the Spanish law be exchanged for the Brazilian one, thus doing away with faultfinding and the protests of other nations, compelling them to blame Brazil when blaming Cuba. Whether under Spanish or Brazilian law, we shall have to pass through a transformation of the gravest importance. Nobody ignores this, yet nobody takes the provisory steps. We cannot understand this indifference, on the solution of which the future of the island largely depends. There is no other country where individual efforts are so strong, and where collective efforts are unknown. Let the initiative for a collective effort come from some prominent planter, acting in the preliminaries in concert with others and the authorities, and adopt in time the proper means looking toward the transformation of labor. Nothing outside of war, of equal of importance to the future of the island with this labor question exists."

RALEIGH, Feb. 24.—On Thursday night last, in the town of Thomasville, Davidson County, while William Thomas and a Miss Forney were before the altar for the purpose of being married, more than half of the ceremony having been performed, the bride dropped dead before the ceremony was concluded, a victim of heart disease.

NO FEIGNED ISSUES ENTERTAINED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

RALIEGH, Feb. 24.—In the suit of Blake against Askew, involving the constitutionality of the special tax bonds, which has been before the Supreme Court of this State for nearly two years, the court filed an opinion yesterday, dismissing the action upon the ground that it was a feigned issue, which is forbidden by the Constitution; that it was not bona fide between the parties, and was gotten up expressly to procure the opinion of the court. In dismissing the case Justice Reade says: "The action is not fit to be entertained."

COUNTERFEITERS ARRESTED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

RALEIGH, Feb. 24.—On Monday last 12 men were arrested at Sand Hill, Richmond County, while engaged in counterfeiting "nickels" and silver coin. A HORSE-THIEF LYNCHED.

ALEXANDRIA, La., Feb. 24.—Last night a man named Cage, hailing from Wilkinson County, Miss., was taken from jail by unknown parties and hanged. He had stolen Major Watts' horse the night before, and was pursued by Watts and captured, and when returning to town, turned and discharged a revolver twice at Watts, wounding him severely in the right breast, and escaped, but was recaptured and lodged in jail. Watts, who is seriously, though not dangerously wounded, was doing well this forenoon.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT.

AT HIS HOME IN FREMONT—A GRAND FAREWELL RECEPTION TO BE GIVEN HIM IN COLUMBUS—ANXIOUS INQUIRIES MADE IN WASHINGTON ABOUT HIS COMING.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

COLUMBUS, Feb. 24.—Gov. Hayes went to his home at Fremont to-day, accompanied by his family, and will remain until some time next week. Preparations are being made by the citizens here, regardless of party, to give him a farewell reception prior to his departure for Washington. It is expected that his resignation as Governor will be presented to the Legislature soon after his return from Fremont. Lieut. Gov. Young will thereupon immediately be installed as his successor.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—Senator Sherman has returned from Ohio, and was in his place in the Senate to-day. He was anxiously questioned by many Republicans and a few Democrats, who desired to know if he had seen the President elect, and if he was soon coming to Washington. He was unable, however, to reply to these inquiries.

THE SOUTH AND PRESIDENT HAYES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

RALEIGH, Feb. 24.—The News of this city, the accredited organ of Gov. Vance and the Democratic Party, speaking of the decision of the Electoral Commission in the Oregon case as making Hayes the next President, says: "The South will not suffer under Hayes' Administration. There is every assurance that he will be both liberal and just to our section."

A PHILADELPHIA THEATRE BURNED

FOX'S THEATRE DESTROYED—THE PLACE CAPABLE OF SEATING 3,000 PERSONS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 25.—Fox's New American Theatre, at Tenth and Chestnut streets, was totally destroyed by fire at 1 o'clock this morning. The place had been closed at 11:45 last night, and no one was in the building except the watchman, Charles Charlton, who was overcome by the smoke, and dragged out of the rear portion. The fire commenced in the property-room, and in three-quarter of an hour the place was entirely destroyed. The players lost all their wardrobes, and the loss will be about $150,000, which is covered by insurance. The Mercantile Library building, and Carncross and Dixey's Theatre, in the rear, were damaged by water. A stiff wind was blowing, and for a while it was feared more of the large buildings in the neighborhood would be burned. The fire is still burning, but is under control.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 25.—At 12:50 this morning fire broke out on the stage of Fox's new American Theatre, and at this hour, 1 A. M., the whole place is in flames. Myriads of burning embers are flying in every direction, and the neighborhood is lighted up for squares. The fire spread with remarkable rapidity, and is communicating with Roger's wagon warehouse. The Mercantile Library Building is in danger, as is also the New-York Mutual's new building at the corner of Tenth and Chestnut streets. A general alarm has been sounded. Fortunately, all hands had left the theatre before the fire broke out. The building was a handsome one, and was erected about 1870.

LATER.—At 2 A. M. the fire is still burning at the Fox Theatre, but, owing to the confusion, no estimate of the loss can be made. The theatre was opened on the evening of Dec. 17, 1870. It occupied a lot 100 by 177 feet, with an entrance from Chestnut-street through an arcade 14 feet wide and had a seating capacity for 3,000 persons.

CORTINA CAPTURED.

THE BORDER RAIDER IN PRISON AT MATAMOROS—GREAT EXCITEMENT THERE—EXPECTATION THAT HE WILL BE SPEEDILY SHOT.

BROWNSVILLE, Texas, Feb. 24.—Gen. John N. Cortina was arrested in Matamoros this afternoon at 5 o'clock, and placed in the military prison. It is believed that he will be court-marshaled and shot for not obeying the order of President Diaz to present himself at the City of Mexico to answer for his conduct on the frontier for the past 10 months. Gen. Corales, Governor of the State, is outside of Matamoros with 1,500 men, and will aid Gen. Blanco in suppressing any attempt on the part of the friends of Cortina to rescue him. There is great excitement in Matamoros, and the partisans of Cortina are flying to the Texas side of the Rio Grande. The authorities express themselves thoroughly prepared to maintain order and execute the law in case of any attempt at violence.

MR. KIDD IS AGAINST PAYING TAXES.

NEW-ORLEANS, Feb. 24.—In the Nicholls Legislature to-day Mr. Kidd, of Jackson Parish, offered the following:

Declaration of the House of Representatives, State of Louisiana.

We, the Representatives of the people of Louisiana, duly elected by and direct from the people, fully aware from positive knowledge of the feeling and determination that impel and control them, do declare that under no circumstances will the people of this State pay tribute to any other State Government than that at whose head stands the man of their choice, their endeared and truly elected Governor, Francis T. Nicholls; and do further declare the utter impossibility of gathering taxes by any other authority, and that any attempt to gather them by other authority than the Nicholls Government will not only prove abortive, but lead to lamentable civil strife, if not to bloodshed and actual war.

ST. LOUIS LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 24.—The Grand Jury to-day returned to the Criminal Court indictments against Henry W. Haugh, President, and John L. Pierce, Secretary, of the Life Association of America, charging them with perjury in signing a statement, which they knew to be false, of the financial condition of the association on Dec. 1, 1875. The Directors of this association sent communications to the Grand Jury yesterday asking them to call for the production of the books and papers of the association, and to take the testimony of its officers respecting the statement upon which the indictments were founded; but the jury gave no heed to the request, and returned indictments against two of its signers. Both gentlemen entered into bonds of $1,500 to appear to answer to the charge.

LEGISLATION FOR THE CITY

THE LINE OF POLICY PROPOSED.

REORGANIZATION AND PURIFICATION—REDUCTION OF SALARIES AND OF THE NUMBER OF OFFICES—SALARIES AND FEES—THE COURTS—MERGING DEPARTMENTS—THE POLICE AND FIRE DEPARTMENTS—STREET CLEANING.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Saturday, Feb. 24, 1877.

The most cursory examination of the mass of City bills which has been poured into the Legislature makes one fact clear above all others, viz., that no more are needed. The matter is becoming a little confusing. With all this mass of crude legislation in ferment, it is hard to keep clearly in mind the measures of purification and reorganization which are really necessary in the City Government. There is danger that these will be covered up and lost sight of in the confusion of schemes. In view of this circumstance, the present time seems a good one to briefly review the line of policy which the Republican majority appear to have marked out, and to indicate the means by which it is to be carried into effect, with the reasons therefor. For convenience, this may be arranged under the following heads:

I.—Single headed commissions for all departments except the Police.

II.—Reduction of salaries of officers and employes.

III.—Reduction of the number of employes, especially court attendants.

IV.—The offices of Register of Deeds, County Clerk, and Coroners to be made salaried offices.

V.—The Marine Court to be abolished.

VI.—The Dock Department to be merged in the Department of Public Works; that of Buildings to be merged in the Fire Department.

VII.—The street cleaning to be given to the Board of ants seem sufficient for this court. Good reasons should be shown for its having more.

Superior Court—This court makes a better exhibit than any of the others, the Judges having voluntarily reduced the staff. It is presided over by six Judges, and there are eleven assistant clerks, and fourteen attendants. Nine of the clerks receive $2,500 per year, the tenth receives $1,500, and the eleventh $1,200. The attendants receive the usual $1,200 each—total for all, $12,100. Further reductions should be made, unless it can be satisfactorily shown that the business of the court requires the present force.

The District Courts—These courts are little nests of corruption and extravagance, which badly need purification. The Justices get $6,000 per year; two assistant clerks $3,000 each (!); a stenographer, $2,000; two attendants, $1,200 each; an interpreter, $1,200; janitor, $1,500—total cost of one court for the year, $19,100. One half of this cost should be cut off.

The exhibit made above shows a fact which has been repeatedly urged upon the attention of the public and the Legislature, i. e., that an evil of greater magnitude in the City Government than the disproportionately high rate of salaries, is the enormous multiplication of offices. Take for instance, the Court of General Sessions. There are three Judges, one of whom receives $15,000 per year, the others $12,000. If these salaries were reduced to $12,000 and $10,000 respectively, the saving would be $7,000 per year; but if the number of court attendants were cut down simply to what are necessary, which is six, the saving would be $36,000 per year.

IV. The offices of Register of Deeds, County Clerk, and Coroners to be made salaried offices.—Bills for this purpose have been introduced in the Senate by Mr. Woodin, and two of them have passed that body. The other is on the general order calendar.

V. The Marine Court to be abolished.—This court is an expensive nuisance, which should be abated with as little delay as possible. A bill is now on its passage through the Legislature to do this. There are six Judges presiding over the court, and each receiving $10,000 a year—$60,000 in all. The court has been enabled to live to this day, mainly because there was one just man in it. Judge McAdam is excepted by every one who is acquainted with the workings of the court from the general condemnation heaped upon his associates. He is an upright Judge, a just man, and possessed of indefatigable industry. The usual crowd of clerks, deputy clerks, and attendants is to be found on the pay-roll of the Marine Court, whose principal work seems to be to eat up the fees paid into it. Very little ever gets into the City Treasury from their hands. The bill above referred to substitutes a City Court for the Marine, presided over by four Judges; it limits the number of clerks and attendants, requires a rigid accounting of fees, and provides for speedy dispatch of business—something which the existing judicial institution has never been guilty of, except where Judge McAdam had charge.

VI. The Dock Department to be merged in the Department of Public Works; that of Buildings in the Fire Department.—These changes have been often urged, and bills for the purpose were introduced at the opening of the session. The several conferences and hearings which have been had late by the Committees on Cities seem to have established the fact that the changes should be made on grounds of economy and efficiency, and it is probable that they will be made. Much of the work done by employes in the Building Department could very well be performed by the firemen; and the Dock Commission seems to be regarded as an unnecessary expense. The duties pertaining to it properly belong to the Public Works Department; and Mr. Allan Campbell, though not specially anxious to have an extra bureau added to his office, was decided in his opinion that the work could be done there.

VII. Street cleaning to be done by the Board of Health, or by a separate department created for the purpose.—Police Commissioner Erhardt acknowledges that the board is heartily sick of the street cleaning business, and would be glad to have it taken from them. It is not in any sense a Police duty, and certainly does not properly belong in the Police Department. The general opinion seems to be that the Health Department is the proper authority to have charge of the matter, because it is really a sanitary business, over which the Health authorities must, and do, have a large degree of control. In the opinion of some, however, it would be better to create a separate department of street cleaning.

VIII. Street cleaning to be done by contract, the contracts to be for small districts.—The failure of the contract system in the past was owing to the size of the contracts. The cleaning of the whole City was contracted for in one contract. It ran for five years, because no man would take it for less, when he had to put a sum of half a million in the necessary plant. The bidding was a farce; there were only one or two men who could take the contract if it were awarded to them. The lucky capitalist did just as he pleased, for he had no competitors. It is now proposed to contract for the cleaning of small districts, so that men of comparatively limited means may have a chance to bid, and thereby competition may be stimulated. Mr. Cowdin's bill, in which this system is provided for, requires that the districts "shall not exceed a police precinct in area." This will have to be altered, as no two police precincts are the same size; some are very small, and one or two are very large. The contract districts will require to be arranged so as to include a dumping-lock in each, whereby the carts of one contractor may not have to cross the district of another, otherwise there would probably be many dumping-grounds inconveniently improvised.

IX. The Policemen and Firemen to be graded in three grades, with salaries to correspond.—On this question there is practically but one opinion. Every one acknowledges that the grading system is the just and proper one for both departments. No one has been heard to oppose it. The only question is whether the system should be applied to men already in service, or only to those who are recruited after the passage of the act. The majority of members seem to be in favor of making the act prospective in its operation. What the salaries will be is matter for consideration. At present, the talk is of $850, $1,000, and $1,200.

X. A Police pension fund to be created for the retirement of old policemen on half pay.—This is a measure which seems demanded by every consideration of justice and humanity. It should accompany the adoption of the grading system. A policeman is appointed for life, or during good behavior. It is well that he should be able to look forward to having a sure provision for his old age. Mr. Hawley, for nearly a quarter of a century the Chief Clerk of the department, stated at the joint meeting of the Committees on Cities that there were 500 Policemen now on the Force who had served from 15 to 20 years on it. Some of them were growing old and unable to perform their duties; but without any means for retiring them they must be kept on the rolls or turned adrift in their declining years to die in penury and want. A bill is now before the Legislature for the creation of a retiring fund. It provides that every policeman who shall for 10 continuous years pay $2 per month to the fund may be retired at the end of 10 years on a pension equal to 20 per cent. of his salary at the time of such retirement, and that the Police Board may, by unanimous vote, retire any man on half pay who has served for 15 or 20 years continuously. The fund is to consist of the payments from the men, 10 per cent. of all Excise moneys, all voluntary contributions to the fund, and the interest from investments of the fund moneys. The pensions are to be fixed and irrevocable. This seems a good bill, but stringent provisions should be inserted in it to guard against any such diversions of the fund moneys as recently happened with the life insurance fund.

XI. Merging the Excise in the Police.—This has been talked of, and it would appear that more than half the work of the Excise Department is now performed by the Police. The duties of inspection, &c., are directly in the line of Police duty. It is regarded as almost beyond question that the Police Department could do all the work of the Excise Commission at very much less expense than is now required, and probably do it better. The question of making the change, however, is still an open one, and will require more consideration before a decision is arrived at.

The above is merely a sketch of the line of policy which seems to have been settled upon at Albany, but it will give an idea of the reforms which are necessary in the City Administration. The one thing required now is their vigorous prosecution by the Republican majority. The responsibility and the duty rests with them.

THE SUICIDE OF MRS. BOWERS.

Coroner Croker yesterday investigated the case of Mrs. Delia C. Bowers, who was killed by falling from the roof of No. 151 Ninth-avenue, on Thursday evening last, and the evidence adduced showed that the woman committed suicide. Daniel H. Bowers, her husband, testified that during the two weeks immediately preceding her death Mrs. Bowers labored under extreme mental excitement, caused by the circulation of baseless rumors affecting her moral character. Mary E. Lotz testified that throughout Thursday Mrs. Bowers was very excited, frequently expressing a wish for death. Mrs. Charlotte Noonan informed the Coroner that she saw Mrs. Bowers suspend her body from the coping of the roof and allow herself to drop to the sidewalk.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.....Feb. 24.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The Senate having notified the House of its readiness to meet in joint session and continue the count of the Electoral vote, the House, after some delay, acquiesced, and a joint session was at once held. The decision of the tribunal in the case of the Oregon vote was read, when objections were made to the counting of the vote of Mr. Watts for Messrs. Hayes and Wheeler, whereupon the Senate withdrew. The question was then debated at considerable length by both bodies. In the House Mr. Hewitt took occasion to arraign Mr. Hoar for what the speaker termed bad faith, in deciding in the Commission contrary to his expressed views at the time the Electoral bill was framed. Mr. Hoar defended himself, and described Mr. Hewitt—quoting from Daniel Webster—as a man rickety, shaky, crazy, and out of joint. The House finally, by a vote of 151 yeas to 107 nays, declared that Watts was not entitled to cast a vote. Some time was also occupied in the Senate in discussing the eligibility of Mr. Watts. The debate was participated in by Senators Kelly, Merrimon, Morton, Conkling, and others. Finally, a resolution presented by Mr. Sargent, that the decision of the Commission stand as the judgment of the Senate, was adopted. The joint meeting was then resumed, and the vote of Oregon was duly recorded. When the vote of Pennsylvania was reached objections were offered to the count because Daniel J. Morrill, who was chosen Elector, was a Centennial Commissioner. Again the Senate withdrew, and returning to its own chamber sustained the vote. The House took a recess, without debate, pending a decision of the Pennsylvania case.

But little legislative business was transacted in either house. In the Senate, the credentials of Mr. Ferry, re-elected Senator from Michigan, were presented. An announcement was made that the House had disagreed to the Senate amendments to the Appropriation bill. In the House, the Army Appropriation bill was reported. The Senate amendments to certain other appropriation bills were nonconcurred in. The Senate bill looking to the publication of a new edition of the Revised Statutes was passed.

THE SENATE READY FOR WORK.

The Senate resumed its session at 10 o'clock, and the President pro tem. presented the following communication from the President of the Electoral Commission:

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23, 1877.

SIR: I am directed by the Electoral Commission to inform the Senate it has considered and decided upon the matters submitted to it under the act of Congress, concerning the same touching the electoral votes from the State of Oregon, and herewith, by direction of said Commission, I transmit to you the said decision in writing, signed by the members agreeing therein, to be read at the meeting of the two houses to-day, or said act. All the certificates and papers sent to the Commission by the President of the Senate are herewith returned.

NATHAN CLIFFORD, President of the Commission.

To Hon. Thomas W. Ferry, President of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN, of Illinois, moved that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate was now ready to meet the House for the purpose of receiving the decision of the Commission and resuming the count. Agreed to.

At 11:15 a message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that that body was ready to meet the Senate to resume the count of the vote for President and Vice President, and the Senate immediately left its chamber for the hall of the House.

THE HOUSE NOT QUITE READY.

At 10:10 a message was received from the Senate informing the House that it was now ready to meet the House in joint convention.

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from Justice Bradley, informing the House that the Electoral Commission had considered and decided the question submitted to it in regard to the votes of the State of Oregon, and had transmitted its decision to the President of the Senate.

Mr. MCMAHON, of Ohio, offered a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to notify the Senate that the House would be ready at 1 o'clock to-day to receive that body for the purpose of continuing the Electoral count.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, raised the point of order that nothing was in order but a resolution to notify the Senate that the House was now ready to receive that body. He therefore offered that resolution. He wished to call attention to the fact that the very moment the Commission reported that it had come to a decision the hall of the House was as much at the disposal of the Senate as of the House. The act arranged for the first meeting in the hall of the House, but it was a gross violation of the spirit of the act that the Senate should ask the House to meet it in the Senate chamber than that the House should shut its doors and prevent the Senate from coming to its hall.

The SPEAKER ruled that Mr. McMahon's resolution was in order, and that Mr. Wilson's resolution could be offered as a substitute. It was so offered, and was agreed to—yeas, 145; nays, 87. The question was then on the resolution as amended.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, endeavored to make a motion for a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday, but was not recognized.

The resolution as amended was agreed to—yeas, 157; nays, 69. The following members voted in the negative:

Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, Banning, Blackburn, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Burchard, Wisconsin, Cabell, Caldwell of Alabama, Caldwell of Tennessee, Carr, Cate, Caulfield, Clark of Indiana, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Cox, Colberson, Davis, Deboit, Dibrell, Egbert, Field, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Gause, Glover, Hamilton of Indiana, Harris of Georgia, Harris of Virginia, Hartzell, Hooker, Hopkins, House, Humphreys, Hunton, Hurd, Jenks, Knott, Landers of Indiana, Lane, Levy, Lyude, Mackey, McLean, McLelland, Money, Morrison, Mutchler, Philips of Missouri, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, Robbins of North Carolina, Roberts, Ross of New Jersey, Scales, Shakley, Siemons, Southard, Springer, Stanton, Steep, Stone, Swann, Terry, Thompson, Tucker, Vance of Ohio, Vance of North Carolina, Waddell, Walker of Virginia, Wallig, Walsh, Whitthorne, Wiggiton, Wike, J. N. Williams of Alabama, Yocum, and Young—89.

Mr. MCMAHON, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote, and Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to lay that motion on the table. The latter motion was agreed to—Yeas 175; nays 74.

The Speaker then directed the Clerk to notify the Senate of the action of the House.

THE JOINT MEETING.

At 11:55 o'clock the presence of the Senate was announced, and the members of the House, as usual, rose and remained standing while the Senators came down the main aisle of the hall and took the places assigned them on the eastern (Democratic) side. The presiding officer of the Senate, having taken the Speaker's chair, called the joint meeting to order, and all having taken their seats said: "The joint meeting of Congress for counting the Electoral votes resumes its session. The two houses having severally agreed pending session to the Commission of objections to the certificates from the State or Oregon have reassembled to receive and coincide (or otherwise) with the decision of that tribunal. It is by a majority of the Commission in writing, and is signed by the members agreeing thereto. It will be now read by the Secretary of the Senate." The decision was read as follows:

ELECTORAL COMMISSION, WASHINGTON, Feb. 23, 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress:

Under the act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved Jan. 29, A. D. 1877, the Electoral Commission in said act having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates and papers accompanying the same of the Electoral vote from the State of Oregon, and the objections hereto, submitted to it under said act, now reports that it has duly considered the same pursuant to said act, and has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and A. W. Watts, named in the certificates of said persons and in the papers accompanying the same, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificates submitted to the Commission, as aforesaid, and marked No. 1, N. C., by said Commission aforesaid with returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely, three votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and three votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New-York for Vice President. The Commission has, by a majority of votes, also decided and does hereby decide and report that the three persons first above named were duly appointed Electors in and by the State of Oregon. The decision is based upon this decision is that it appears upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject that the before-mentioned Electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such Electors of President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of Oregon, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the laws, and they are further of opinion that by the laws of the State of Oregon the duty of canvassing the returns of all the votes given at the election of President and Vice President was imposed upon the Secretary of State and upon no one else; that the Secretary of State did canvass these returns in the case before us, and thereby ascertained that J. Caringht, W. H. Odell, and A. W. Watts had a majority of all the votes given for Electors, and had the highest number of votes for that office, and by the express language of the statute those persons are deemed elected; that in obedience to this duty the Secretary of State made a canvass and tabulated statement of the votes showing this result, which, according to law, he placed on file in his office on the 54th day of December, A. D. 1876—all this appears by an official certificate under the seal of the State, and signed by him, and delivered by him to the Electors, and forwarded by them to the President of the Senate with their votes; that the refusal or failure of the Governor of Oregon to sign the certificate of the election of the persons so elected does not have the effect of defeating their appointment as such Electors; that the act of the Governor of Oregon in giving to E. A. Cronin a certificate of his election, though he received 1,000 votes less than Watts, on the ground that the latter was ineligible, was without authority of law, and is therefore void; that, although the evidence showed that Watts was a Postmaster at the time of his election, that fact is rendered immaterial by his resignation, both as Postmaster and Elector, and his subsequent appointment to fill the vacancy so made by the Electoral College.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide, by a majority of votes, and reports, that as a consequence of the foregoing, and upon the grounds before stated, the paper purporting to be a certificate of the Electoral vote of said State of Oregon, signed by E. A. Cronin, A. N. Miller, and John Parker, marked No. 2, N. C., by the Commission, and herewith returned is not the certificate of the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

The PRESIDING OFFICER asked whether there were objections to the decision.

Senator KELLY, of Oregon, objected to the decision on the following grounds:

First—That Watts was not elected a Presidential Elector for the State of Oregon.

Second—That he was not appointed a Presidential Elector.

Third—That he was disqualified to receive any appointment as Presidential Elector, or to act as such, in that he held an office of trust and profit under the United States.

Fourth—That Cronin was elected a Presidential candidate for the State of Oregon, and in accordance with law cast a legal vote as such Elector for Tilden and Hendricks, and that such vote should be counted.

The objection is signed by Senators Kelly, Whyte, of Maryland; Cooper, of Tennessee; McDonald, of Indiana; Norwood, of Georgia, and Hereford, of West Virginia; and by Representatives Lane, of Oregon; Poppleton, of Ohio; Jenks, of Pennsylvania; Vance, of Ohio; Throckmorton, of Texas; Wike, of Illinois, and Wiggiton and Luttrell, of California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER asked whether there were any further objections to the decision, and, there being none, he announced that the Senate would withdraw to its chamber in order that the houses separately might consider and determine the objection.

THE SENATE'S ACTION.

Upon returning, at 12:10, the President pro tem. said the Senate having returned from the joint meeting of the House of Representatives on account of an objection to the decision of the Commission in regard to the vote of Oregon, that objection would now be read.

The Secretary then read the objection presented in the joint meeting.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, submitted the following:

Resolved, That the decision of the Commission upon the Electoral Vote of the State of Oregon stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objection made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. KELLY, of Oregon, said it appeared that the decision of the Commission recites the fact, that on the 7th day of November last John W. Watts was a Postmaster in Oregon, but it said, notwithstanding that fact, he was eligible as a Presidential Elector, providing he did not hold the office at the time he cast his vote as a member of the Electoral College on the 6th of December. In his [Mr. Kelly's] judgment, that was a plain violation of the Constitution of the United States. He referred to the California and Rhode Island cases, heretofore alluded to, and argued that a person holding a Federal office was not eligible to be voted for as a Presidential Elector.

Mr. MERRIMON, of North Carolina, said he could not give the sanction of his judgment to the decisions of the Electoral Commission. He referred to the Florida and Louisiana cases, and said a solemn inquiry should have been made in regard to these States, and if it turned out that the persons claiming to be Electors were not, their votes were null and void.

Mr. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, referred to the Rhode Island case alluded to by Mr. Kelly, and said the Supreme Court in this State decided as to the ineligibility of an Elector who held a Federal office, but it did not decide that the person receiving the next highest number of votes was elected in his place.

SENATOR MORTON'S ARGUMENT.

Mr. MORTON said: I believe it was not argued by anybody upon the Commission that Cronin was elected, that Tilden had a vote in Oregon; but the minority of the Commission took the ground that there were but two Electors chosen in Oregon, and that Hayes had but two votes in that State. Watts was Postmaster at Lafayette on the 7th day of November, and was therefore, they say, that he was not elected, that the election was a failure so far as he was concerned, and that but two were elected on the 13th of November. Watts resigned on the 14th. His resignation was accepted, and on the same day the office was transferred to another, and to another building. When the Electors met on the 6th of December, Watts handed in his resignation as an Elector, and was afterward chosen to fill the vacancy, and cast his vote; although Watts was not a Postmaster or an office-holder on the 6th of December. When the Electors voted it was argued that there was no such vacancy in the College of Electors as that college had a right to fill, and, therefore, that the election of the college was a nullity. On the other hand, Watts, Odell, and Cartwright received many of the majorities of the people's votes, ranging over one thousand above their highest competitor. The Secretary of State canvassed the vote on the 4th of December, and made his certificate of the result showing the election of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, which was filed in the office of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State was the canvassing or returning officer for the State of Oregon. The Governor's duty is simply ministerial. It would be an idle and empty duty to issue a certificate to the persons having the highest number of votes. The law makes the declaration as to who is elected. The law declares that the person having the highest number of votes is elected, and it requires no declaration on the part of any officer of that result. The duty of the Governor is imperative to sign the list which is made out by the Secretary of State, who, as in the case of members of Congress, is made the canvassing and returning officer. The Governor is no part of the Returning Board, has nothing to do with the canvassing of the votes, but is absolutely required to sign the list made out by the Secretary of State. It was contended by a majority of the Commission that the law authorized the College of Electors, or a majority, to fill a vacancy arising from any cause, death, refusal to act, failure to attend, failure to elect, from any cause that can be imagined. It was the purpose to allow the College of Electors the right to fill any vacancy, so that the State of Oregon should be fully represented in the Electoral College. The College of Electors exercised this unquestioned right. Watts, on the 6th of December, was not a Federal officeholder. He was as completely qualified as any citizen in Oregon. We hold, therefore, that it was wholly immaterial whether he was a Postmaster on the 7th of November or not, because if he was not a Federal officeholder on the 6th of December, if he was then qualified, that brought him within the meaning of the Constitution. To remove any doubts he himself resigned the office of Elector, so as to make a vacancy in the Electoral College certain, and then the College of Electors, under the unquestionable authority of the law, elected Cronin to fill the vacancy so as to make the Electoral College complete and lawful under all circumstances, and in any view of the case.

MR. CONKLING'S VIEWS.

Mr. CONKLING, of New-York, said: Mr. President, Oregon meant to appoint the Republican Presidential Electors. The people of Oregon, by a plain and undeniable majority, honestly and unconditionally voted for the Republican Electors. Two certificates having been received from Oregon, the question of the count of her votes has been examined by the Electoral Commission. A majority of the Commissioners have sent us two things, first, a decision that the vote ought to be counted, as the majority of the State really and honestly meant it to be counted, and as they declared at the ballot box it should be counted; second, a statement of reasons by which the decision was reached by the Commissioners. On the first matter thus reported, namely, the decision that Oregon's vote ought to be counted as designed and directed by the people of Oregon, the Senate is called on to express its judgment. The form of this expression is proposed in the pending resolution. That resolution does not, as I understand it, summon any Senator to express his opinion of the reasons assigned for the decision submitted to us. I therefore, say nothing about the argument or reasons which appear in the paper read in the joint meeting to-day. Every Senator is entitled to his own argument and his own mode of arriving at his own opinion. Those who hold the right and power to utter the voice of that State meant they should speak. My vote here will express this judgment. All beyond this I disclaim. In the brief moment allotted to this discussion an argument would not be possible. I shall, therefore, attempt no statement of my reasons. I could not argue them in the ten minutes given to each Senator. I would not attempt to make one. I will do nothing to deter for a moment the conclusion of the Presidential count. Or the contrary, I will in every lawful way hasten the proceedings to the end that at the earliest hour the vote of the last State may be counted and the result declared under the law, quietly, certainly, and conclusively. I therefore surrender in the interest of expedition the remainder of my time.

VIEWS OF OTHER SENATORS.

Mr. SAULSBURY, of Delaware, read an argument in regard to the decision of the Commission, and said he could not allow this decision to pass without entering his protest. He would say nothing of the personnel of this Commission, but the American people would not be satisfied, and they ought not to be satisfied with their decision. It defeated for the first time our Electoral system and brought reproach upon republican institutions.

Mr. BOGY, of Missouri, said this question was too grave, too important for him to let it pass without entering his solemn protest against the decision of the Commission. The State of Florida, in violation of all law, had been robbed of the votes by which she elected the Tilden Electors, and in Louisiana the Returning Board robbed the people of 10,000 majority which they had given for Mr. Tilden, and gave the majority to the other candidate. Now, in the State of Oregon there was an Elector who held a Federal office, and yet he was declared to be eligible. He entered his protest against the conclusions of the Commission. A person was to be inaugurated President of the United States against whom there was a popular majority of 300,000. It was the beginning of a new era, the beginning of a dark period.

Mr. MCMILLAN, of Minnesota, spoke briefly in regard to facts of the Oregon case, and argued that the appointment of Watts by the other two Electors after he had resigned the office of Postmaster, was legal under the law of the State.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, said it struck his mind as a notable circumstance that not a member of the Senate had arisen to defend the scheme whereby Cronin was made an Elector and organized his Electoral College; therefore Congress was brought down to the simple question as to whether Watts was eligible at the time he acted with the Electoral College. Mr. Cronin had departed from the scene, and with him Mr. Patrick, and he was glad that there was virtue enough to reject such bold schemes as this for imposing on the will of the people. It was a great hardship to deprive a State of representation in the Electoral College, and it ought never to be done when it could be avoided. The State of Oregon was entitled to the same rights as California, New-York, Ohio, or any other State, and all the principles of equality were on her side. It was for Congress to say if they should prevail.

Mr. WHYTE, of Missouri, said: When I cast most reluctantly my vote for the Electoral Commission bill, I did it with the declaration in this body that I deemed it a Democratic surrender; but in response to the appeal from the country for an honest count, and in the belief that men could be be found who preferred that there should be neither stultification nor dishonor connected in any way with the Presidential office, and that the "true and lawful vote" of every State should be ascertained, I abandoned my own views and supported that measure. The people believed that this High Commission was appointed for the express purpose of going into the inquiry, and ascertaining what were the real and lawful votes of every State in this Union. They were beaten in a game of conference. They trusted implicitly that from this high Commission there would come "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." The people did not understand the fine language of legal construction. They did not know that two little words were to defeat all that they had hoped for, and after the mountain had been in labor it would bring forth a mouse. Florida torn from Mr. Tilden by the plainest perversion of the law, Oregon captured in defiance of the clear inhibition of the Constitution, and Louisiana wrung from its people, who, by a majority of 10,000 votes, repudiated the Republican candidates. By such instrumentalities as these Rutherford B. Hayes is to be inducted into the Presidential office; but in the eyes of the people the commission to that exalted station is stained and blackened with the most glaring frauds that ever disgraced a civilized country.

Mr. KERNAN, of New-York, referred to the Electoral Commission, and said: In November President Grant said in a public document that there must be an honest and fair count of the vote for President and Vice President, and if any man should take the office with a questioned title he would be unworthy of the high trust. He agreed with the President in that expression. The people received the law organizing the Electoral Commission with favor, but the decision of that Commission had not relieved the country. The President so soon to be inaugurated must rest the title of his office upon the votes as cast by J. Madison Wells and his associates in Louisiana. He believed in standing by the Constitution and the laws. The people of the country could take care of the country, and in the elections to come they would place the result beyond the power of any Returning Board in this Union. That was his hope.

Mr. EATON, of Connecticut, said: While I agree in part with what has been said by my distinguished friend from New-York, [Mr. Kernan,] I do not agree at all that he has said. He trusts to the people to the ballot-box. The people trusted to and been first. Here it is for us to do our duty; let us do it. I should not have risen upon this occasion, except that my friend—my cherished friend—from Kentucky, now out of his seat by illness, [Mr. Stevenson,] said the other day that he thanked God that there was such unanimity in the vote of Democracy of the Senate upon the bill creating the Electoral Commission. I regret that my friends around me, many of them like my friend from Georgia [Mr. Gordon] and others, felt as I felt on that occasion. I know they did not see fit to vote with me, but I thank God that He endowed me with the strength necessary to stand by my constitutional convictions. Sir, the manifest will of the people of the United States has been defeated by the action of the unwarrantable, unconstitutional Commission. I say unwarrantable by the Constitution. Sir, there was a duty devolving upon the Senate and the House of Representatives, and that duty Congress abandoned. Mr. Eaton then argued that what the people did demand was that Congress should discharge the duty the Constitution imposed upon it. If he had in his hand the power of the House of Representatives, he would say to this unconstitutional Commission, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further." Had he the power of that House he would stop the acting of this Returning Board to-day. He then referred to the alleged frauds in Louisiana and Florida, and said the Commission refused to go behind the certificate of the Governor of one State and went right behind it in another. Then it did not so go behind the certificate of the Governor in the last case [Louisiana] because it was necessary to elect their man not to do so. The Commission did not see fit to go behind the action of a rotten Returning Board in Louisiana, rotten to the heart, because they knew it they did Samuel J. Tilden must be declared elected, as he was elected, President of the United States. He simply arose to vindicate the vote which he gave against the Electoral bill a few weeks ago, and if it was to be taken over again he did not believe he would stand alone of the Democratic side of the Chamber in opposing the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WITHERS, of Virginia, commented on the decision of the Commission in the Florida case and said a ruling directly opposite was made in the Louisiana case. When Oregon was reached, the broad seal of the State, which had so much sanctity in Louisiana, had no force whatever. The effect of this decision upon the people would be most unhappy. It had already spread alarm throughout the country.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, said that the same principle which demanded that the voice of the people of Oregon should be heard demanded that the people of Florida should be heard. But the people of the State were not heard, and a majority of the voters of that State had been disfranchised.

A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE RESOLUTION SUBMITTED.

Mr. COCKRELL, of Missouri, submitted the following as a substitute for the resolution of Mr. Sargent:

Resolved, That inasmuch as J. W. Watts was on Nov. 7, 1876, a Deputy United States Postmaster, and held an office of trust and profit under the United States, he was ineligible by the terms of the Constitution to the office of Elector for the State of Oregon, and W. H. Odell and J. C. Cartwright were the only Electors duly appointed by the State of Oregon, and their votes only should be counted, and the decision of the Electoral Commission should be sustained, and judgment of the Senate only so far as their decision sustained the votes cast by said Odell and Cartwright.

Rejected—yeas 24, nays 40, a strict party vote.

THE SENATE AGREES TO SUSTAIN THE COMMISSION.

The question then being on the resolution of Mr. Sargent, it was agreed to—yeas 40, nays 24, a strict party vote.

FURTHER PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. SARGENT then submitted a resolution instructing the Secretary to notify the House of Representatives of the decision of the Senate and also that the Senate was ready to meet the House and resume the count. Agreed to.

Mr. MCDONALD, of Indiana, asked unanimous consent to take up the resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to the life and character of the late Speaker Kerr. He said the matter had been delayed until now on account of his absence from the city, having been a member of the Louisiana Investigating Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS, of Vermont, said he regretted very much to do so, but he must object to anything being considered while the count was in progress. It was clearly against the law. He was sorry to interpose an objection, as he knew the deceased personally and entertained the highest respect for him.

At 3:50 P. M. a message was received from the House of Representatives announcing the action of that body on the Oregon case, and notifying the Senate that it was ready to proceed with the count. The Senate then left its chamber.

FILIBUSTERING IN THE HOUSE.

After the Senators had withdrawn, the SPEAKER announced the commencement (at 12:10) of a new legislative day, which was thereupon opened by the Chaplain with prayer. The journal of yesterday having been read, and a few unrolled bills having been presented and signed by the Speaker, Mr. CLYMER, of Pennsylvania, offered a resolution, that for the more careful consideration of the objections to the report of the Electoral Commission in the Oregon case, the House shall now take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday morning. He desired to state why he offered the resolution. He was met by objections on the Republican side, and by the Speaker's ruling that the question was not debatable.

Mr. CLYMER—Do the gentlemen on the other side refuse to hear a statement as to the object of the recess?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New-York—I object to debate.

Mr. HANCOCK, of Texas, made and argued the point of order that, under the Constitution and under the Electoral law, a recess was not now in order. In conclusion, he said, I feel as keenly as any other the mortification of defeat and disappointment, but I hope that no one will so far lose his manhood as to fail in the performance of his duty. There is no authority in either house to procrastinate, to delay, to resort to any legislative or parliamentary expedients to postpone the action enjoined upon us by the Constitution.

Mr. CLYMER—This is a question of order, not of manhood, and it seems to be a work of supererogation to raise this question of order after it has been already decided four times. I wish further to say that in making the motion I have done it—

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New-York—I object to debate.

Several other Republicans—Let him go on.

Mr. TOWNSEND—Very well.

Mr. CLYMER (continuing)—As my motive has been impugned, I have a right to say that so far as I am concerned, and I believe so far as the large majority of those with whom I act are concerned, the motion is made in good faith. This Oregon question does involve issues of the highest importance to all the people, and it those who wish to present their reasons for opposing the finding of the Commission should ask for delay, should ask for time, should ask for the quiet of the Sabbath to come over them and their outraged feelings—[Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]—they ought to have it. Therefore I have made the motion in good faith.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky—Is it in order to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER—Not unless it be on the point of order. Each side having been heard, the Chair thinks it his duty to confine the discussion to the question of order. The Chair decided on the 5th of February the same question in the Florida case, and an appeal being taken from his decision, the appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 156 to 76. The Chair has since that decision consulted various persons whose names, if I were at liberty to state them, would be recognized as those of men of great parliamentary practice and knowledge, and hardly one of them dissented from the opinion and ruling of the Chair.

In conclusion, the Speaker overruled the point of order and decided that the motion was in order. The question was then taken and the resolution was rejected—Yeas 112, nays 158.

ANOTHER DILATORY MOTION.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, then moved for a recess till 9:30 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, made the point of order that; the motion was a dilatory one, and, therefore, in contravention of the Constitution and law.

The SPEAKER—The Chair is unable to recognize the motion in any other light than a dilatory motion.

Mr. LANE—It was not so intended.

The SPEAKER—The Chair is unable to classify it in any other way. The Chair rules that where the Constitution of the United States directs anything to be done, and where a law under the Constitution of the United States and in obedience thereto directs anything to be done by either house, it is not in order by any motion to obstruct or impede the execution of that constitutional law. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. LANE—I desire to say, in justice to myself, that it was not in that spirit that I made a motion to take a recess. [Calls to order.] It is a matter of personal privilege, and I have a right to explain.

The SPEAKER—The Chair would state to the gentleman from Oregon—

Mr. LANE—I trust the Chair will not interrupt me. [Laughter.] The Chair has stated that I made the motion in that spirit.

The SPEAKER—The Chair has not attempted to classify the gentleman's motives, or to indicate what they were. That belongs to a higher power. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE—To that higher power I am willing to submit.

A MEMBER—You cannot go back of the returns. [Laughter.]

The attention of the Speaker was directed to the breaches of decorum on the floor and in the galleries. The SPEAKER announced that if the disturbance was renewed he would direct the galleries to be cleared.

SUNSET COX SAT UPON.

Mr. COX, of New-York, hoped that the rules would be enforced on the floor and have it cleared first.

The SPEAKER suggested that he was unable to perceive how business could be proceeded with if the floor were cleared. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine, then presented the following order:

Ordered, That the count of the Electoral vote of the State of Oregon shall proceed in conformity with the decision of the Electoral Commission.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, offered the following as a substitute:

Ordered, That the vote purporting to be an Electoral vote for President and Vice President, and which was given by one James W. Watts, claiming to be an Elector from the State of Oregon, be not counted.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, opened the discussion. He reviewed the law in the case of Oregon, in order to show that Watts was really entitled to cast his vote for President and Vice President, and therefore he upheld the decision of the Commission. It had been decided in the Commission by a unanimous vote, that Cronin, though he had received the Governor's certificate, was utterly without title or authority in the premises.

Mr. CLYMER, of Pennsylvania, next addressed the House.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, argued from the statutes of Oregon and from the decisions of the Oregon courts that the decision should be sustained.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, made a very bitter speech arraigning the Commissioners, insinuating bribery and corruption on their part, but declaring that the South would accept the situation. As to the intimations that Southern men would find places in President Hayes' Cabinet, he declared that if any Southern men joined in with the Republican Party to sustain it in its past and present policy they would have no following or influence at home, and would be pariahs in the land of their birth. There would be no divisions in the Democracy. But still he asked the Republicans to halt, as forbearance had its limits. To the Democrats he counseled patience, courage, prudence, and moderation, as it was better to "bear the ills we know than fly to others that we know not of." To reject the action of the Commission would be to produce anarchy, confusion, and chaos.

Mr. SAMPSON, of Iowa, said that from the commencement of this Congress gentlemen on the other side of the House had been crying fraud, bribery, and corruption, and yet in the Oregon case was found for the first time positive evidence of bribery. The first bribe had been taken by a Democrat and the first money had been paid by Nature.

As a fond mother, when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half willing, half reluctant to be led,
And leave his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them through the open door,
Nor wholly reassured and comforted
By promises of others in their stead,
Which, though more splendid, may not please him more;
So Nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings one by one, and by the hand
Leads us to rest so gently, that we go
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being too full of sleep to understand
How far the unknown transcends the what we know.

Here lies the gentle humorist, who died
In the bright Indian Summer of his fame!
A simple stone, with but a date and name,
Marks his secluded resting place beside
The river that he loved and glorified.
There in the Autumn of his days he came,
But the dry leaves of life were all aflame
With tints that brightened and were multiplied.
How sweet a life was his; how sweet a death;
Living to wing with mirth the weary hours,
Or with romantic tales the heart to cheer;
Dying, to leave a memory like the breath
Of Summers full of sunshine and of showers,
A grief and gladness in the atmosphere.

Eliot's Oak.

Thou ancient oak! whose myriad leaves are loud
With sounds of unintelligible speech,
Sounds as of surges on a shingly beach,
Or multitudinous murmurs of a crowd;
With some mysterious gift of tongues endowed,
Thou speakest a different dialect to each;
To me a language that no man can teach,
Of a lost race, long vanished like a cloud.
For underneath thy shade, in days remote,
Seated like Abraham at eventide
Beneath the oaks of Mamre, the unknown
Apostle of the Indians, Eliot, wrote
His Bible in a language that hath died
And is forgotten, save by thee alone.

The Descent of the Muses.

Nine sisters, beautiful in form and face,
Came from their convent on the shining heights
Of Pierus, the mountain of delights,
To dwell among the people at its base.
Then seemed the world to change. All time and space,
Splendor of cloudless days and starry nights,
And men and manners, and all sounds and sights,
Had a new meaning, a diviner grace.
Proud were these sisters, but were not too proud
To teach in schools of little country towns
Science and song, and all the arts that please;
So that wise housewives span, and farmers plowed,
Their comely daughters, clad in homespun gowns,
Learned the sweet songs of the Pierides.

White swan of cities, slumbering in thy nest
So wonderfully built among the reeds
Of the lagoon, that fences thee and feeds,
As sayeth thy old historian and thy guest!
White water lily, cradled and caressed
By ocean streams, and from the salt and weeds
Lifting thy golden pistils with their seeds,
Thy sun-illumined spires, thy crown and crest!
White phantom city, whose untrodden streets
Are rivers, and whose pavements are the shifting
Shadows of palaces and strips of sky;
I wait to see thee vanish like the fleets
Seen in mirage, or towers of cloud uplifting
In air their unsubstantial masonry.

THE MYSTERY AT NUMBER SEVEN.

"Let us go and give her a turn," cried the Squire.

Tod laughed. "What, all of us?" said he.

"To be sure. All of us. Why not? We'll start to-morrow."

"Oh dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Todhetley, dismay in her mild tone. "Children and all?"

"Children and all: and take Hannah to see to them," said the Squire. "You don't count, Joe: you will be off elsewhere."

"We could never be ready," said the Mater, looking the image of perplexity. "To-morrow's Friday. Besides, there would be no time to write to Mary."

"Write to her!" cried the Squire, turning sharply on his heel as he paced the room in his nankeen morning coat. "And who do you suppose is going to write to her? Why, it would cause her to make all sorts of preparation; put her to no end of trouble. A pretty conjurer you'd make! We will take her by surprise; that's what we will do."

"But, if, when we got there, we should find her rooms are let, Sir?" said I, the doubt striking me.

"Then we'll go into others, Johnny. A spell at the sea-side will be a change for us."

This conversation, and the Squire's planning out, arose through a letter we had just received from Mary Blair—poor Blair's widow, if you have not forgotten him, who went to his end through that gazette of Jerry's. After a few ups and downs, trying at this thing for a living, trying at that, Mrs. Blair had now settled in a house at the seaside and opened a day-school. She hoped to get on in it in time, she wrote, especially if she could be so fortunate as to let her drawing-room to visitors. The Squire, always impulsive and good-hearted, at once cried out that we would go and take it.

"It will be doing her a good turn, you see," he ran on, "and when we leave I daresay she'll find other people to go in. Let's see"—picking up the letter to refer to the address: "No. 6 Seabord Terrace, Montpellier-by-Sea. Whereabouts is Montpellier-by-Sea?"

"Never heard of it in my life," cried Tod. "Don't believe there is such a place!"

"Be quiet, Joe. I fancy it lies somewhere toward Saltwater."

Tod flung back his head. "Saltwater! A nice common place that is!"

"Hold your tongue, Sir. Johnny, fetch me the railway guide."

Upon looking at the guide, it was found there, "Montpellier-by-Sea," the last station before getting to Saltwater. As to Saltwater, it might be common, as Tod said, for it was crowded by all sorts of people, but it was lively and healthy.

Not on the next day, Friday, for it was impossible to get ready in such a heap of a hurry, but on the following Tuesday we started. Tod had left on the Saturday for Gloucestershire. His own mother's relatives lived there, and they were always inviting him.

"Montpellier-by-Sea?" cried the railway clerk in a doubting tone as we were getting the tickets. "Let's see? Where is that?"

Of course that set the Squire exploding; what right had clerks to pretend to issue tickets unless they knew their business? The clerk in question coolly ran his finger down the railway list he had turned to, and then gave us the tickets.

"It is a station not much frequented, you see," he civilly observed. "Travelers mostly go on to Saltwater."

But for the train being due, and our having to make a rush for the platform, the Squire would have waited to give the young man a piece of his mind. "Saltwater, indeed!" said he, "I wonder the fellow does not issue his edict as to where people shall go and where they sha'n't."

We arrived in due time at our destination. It was written up as large as life on a white board, "Montpellier-by-Sea." A small road-side station, open to the country around; no signs of sea or of houses to be seen; a broad, rural district, apparently given over entirely to agriculture. On went the whistling train, leaving the group of us standing by our luggage on the platform. The Squire was staring about him doubtfully.

"Can you tell me where Seabord Terrace is?"

"Seabord Terrace?" repeated the Station-master, "No, Sir, I don't know it. There's no terrace of that name hereabouts. For that matter, there are no terraces at all; no houses, in fact."

The Squire's face was a picture. He saw that (save a solitary farm homestead or two) the country was bare of dwelling places.

"This is Montpellier-by-Sea?" he questioned at last.

"Sure enough it is, Sir. Munpler it's called down here."

"Then Seabord Terrace must be somewhere in it—somewhere about. What a strange thing!"

"Perhaps the gentlefolks want to go to Saltwater?" spoke up one of the two porters employed at the little station. "There's lots of terraces there. Here, Jim!"—calling to his fellow—"come here a minute. He'll know, Sir; he comes from Saltwater."

Jim approached, and settled the doubt at once. He knew Seabord Terrace very well indeed. It was at Saltwater; just out at the eastern end of it.

Yes, it was at Saltwater. And there were we, more than two miles off it, on a broiling hot day when walking was impracticable, with all our trunks about us, and no fly to be had, or other means of getting on. The Squire went into one of his passions, and demanded why people living at Saltwater should give their address as Montpellier-by-Sea.

He had hardly patience to listen to the Station-master's explanation, who acknowledged that we were not the first traveling party that had been deluded in like manner. Munpler (as he and the rest of the natives persisted in calling it) was an extensive, straggling, rural parish, filled with farm lands; an arm of it extended as far as Saltwater, and the new buildings at that end of Saltwater had rechristened themselves Montpellier-by-Sea, deeming it more aristocratic than the common old name. Had the Squire been able to transport the new buildings, builders and all, he had surely done it on the spot.

Well, we got on to Saltwater in the evening by another tram, and to No. 6 Seabord Terrace. Mary Blair was just delighted.

"If I had but known you were coming, if you had but written to me, I would have explained that it was Saltwater Station you must get out at, not Montpellier," she cried in deprecation.

"But, my dear, why on earth do you give in to a deceit?" stormed the Squire. "Why call your place Montpellier when it's Saltwater?"

"I do what other people do," she sighed; "I was told it was Montpellier when I came here. Generally speaking, I have explained when writing to friends that it is really Saltwater, in spite of its fine name; I suppose I forgot it when writing to you—I had so much to say. The people really to blame are those who named it so."

"And that's true, and they ought to be shown up," said the Squire.

Seabord Terrace consisted of seven houses, built in front of the sea, a little beyond the town. The parlors had bay windows; the drawing rooms had balconies and verandas. The two end houses, Nos. 1 and 7, were double houses, large and handsome, each of them being inhabited by a private family; the middle houses were smaller, most of them being let out in lodgings in the season. Mary Blair began talking that first evening as we sat together about the family who lived in the house next door to her, No. 7. Their name was Peahern, she said, and they had been so very, very kind to her since she took her house in March. Mr. Peahern had interested himself for her and got her several pupils; he was much respected at Saltwater. "Ah, he is a good man," she added, "but ——"

"I'll call and thank him," interrupted the Squire. "I am proud to shake hands with such a man as that."

"You cannot," she said; "he and his wife are gone abroad. A great misfortune has lately befallen them."

"A great misfortune! what was it?"

I noticed a kind of cloud pass over Mary Blair's face, a hesitation in her manner before she replied. Mrs. Todhetley was sitting by her on the sofa: the Squire was in the arm-chair opposite them, and I at the table, as I had sat at our tea-dinner.

"Mr. Peahern was in business once; a wholesale druggist, I believe; but he made a good fortune, and retired some years ago," began Mary. "Mrs. Peahern has poor health and is a little lame. She was very kind to me also; very good and kind indeed. They had one son; no other children; I think he was studying for the Bar; I am not sure; but he lived in London and came down here occasionally. My young maid-servant, Susan, got acquainted with their servants, and she gathered from their gossip that he, Edmund Peahern, a very handsome young man, was in some way a trouble to his parents. He was down at Easter, and stayed three weeks; and in May he came down again. What happened I don't know; I believe there was some scene with his father the day he arrived; anyway, Mr. Peahern was heard talking angrily to him: and that night he—he died."

She had dropped her voice to a low whisper. The Squire spoke.

"Died! Was it a natural death?

"No. A jury decided that he was insane; and he was buried here in the churchyard. Such a heap of claims and debts came to light, it was said. Mr. Peahern left his lawyer to pay them all, and went abroad with his poor wife for change of scene. It has been a great grief I feel so sorry for them."

"Then, is the house shut up?"

"No. Two servants are left in it: the two house-maids. The cook, who had lived with them five-and-twenty years, and was dreadfully affected at the calamity, went with her mistress. Nice, good-natured young women are these two that are left, running in most days to ask if they can do anything for me."

"It is good to have such neighbors," said the Squire. "And I hope you'll yet on, my dear. How came you at this place at all?"

"It was through Mr. Lockett," she answered—the clergyman who had been so much with her husband before he died, and who had kept up a correspondence with her. Mr. Lockett's brother was in practice as a doctor at Saltwater, and they thought she might perhaps do well if she came to it. So Mary's friends had screwed a point or two to put her into the house, and gave her besides a ten-pound note to start with.

"I tell you what it is, young Joe; if you run and reve yourself into that scariet heat you sha'n't come here with me again."

"But I like to race with the donkeys," replied young Joe. "I can run a'most as fast as they, Johnny. I like to see the donkeys."

"Wouldn't it be better to ride a donkey, lad?"

He shook his head. "I have never had a ride but once," he answered. "I've no sixpences for it. That once Matilda treated me. She brings me on the sands."

"Who is Matilda?"

"Matilda at No. 7: Mr. Peahern's."

"Well, it you are agood boy, young Joe, and stay by me, you shall have a ride as soon as the donkeys come back."

They were fine sands. I sat down on a bench with a book; little Joe strained his eyes to look after the donkeys in the distance, cantering off with some young shavers like himself on their backs, their nursemaids walking quickly after them. Poor little Joe!—he had the gentlest, meekest face in the world, with his thoughtful look and nice eyes—waited and watched in silent patience. The sands were crowded with people this afternoon; organs were playing, dancing dolls exhibiting; and vessels with their white sails spread glided smoothly up and down on the sparking sea.

"And will you really pay the sixpence?" asked the little fellow presently. "They won't let me get on for less."

"Really and truly, Joe. I'll take you for a row in a boat some calm day, if mamma will allow you to go."

Joe looked grave. "I don't much like the water, please," said he, timidly. "Alfred Dale went on it in a boat and fell in, and was nearly drowned. He comes to mamma's school,"

"Then we'll let the boats alone, Joe. There's Punch! He is going to set himself up yonder. Wouldn't you like to run and see him?"

"But I might miss the donkeys," answered Joe.

He stood by me quietly, gazing in the direction taken by the donkeys: evidently they made his primary attraction. The other child, Mary, who was a baby when her father died, (poor Baked Pie, as we boys used to call him at Frost's,) was in Wales with Mrs. Blair's people. They had taken the child for a few months, until they saw whether she should get along at Saltwater.

But we thought she would get along. Her school was a morning school for little boys of good parentage, all of whom paid liberal terms; and she would be able to let her best rooms for at least six months in the year.

"There's Matilda! Oh, there's Matilda!"

It was quite a loud shout for little Joe. Looking up, I saw him rush to a rather good-looking young woman, neatly dressed in a black-and-white print gown and a shawl of the same, with black ribbons crossed on her straw bonnet. Servants did not dress fine enough to set the Thames on fire in those days. Joe pulled her triumphantly up to me. She was one of the housemaids at No. 7.

"It's Matilda," he said; and the young woman courtsied. "And I am going to have a donkey-ride, Matilda; Mr. Johnny Ludlow's going to give the sixpence for me!"

"I know you by sight, Sir," observed Matilda to me. "I have seen you go in and out of No. 6."

She had a pale olive complexion, with magnificent, melancholy dark eyes. Many persons would have called her handsome. I took a sort of liking for the girl—if only for her kindness to poor little fatherless Joe. In manner she was particularly quiet, subdued, and patient.

"You had a sad misfortune at your house not long ago," I observed to her, at a loss for something to say.

"Oh, Sir, don't talk of it, please!" she answered, with a sob of the breath. "I seem to have the shivers at times ever since. It was me that found him."

Up cantered the donkeys, and presently away went Joe on the back of one, Matilda attending him. The ride was just over and Joe beginning to enlarge on its delights to me, when another young woman, dressed precisely similar to Matilda, even to the zigzag white running pattern on the print gown, and the black cotton gloves, was seen making her way toward us. She was nice looking also in a different way; fair, with blue eyes, and a laughing, arch face.

"Why, there's Jane Cross!" exclaimed Matilda. "What in the world have you come out for, Jane? Have you left the house safe?"

"As if I should leave it unsafe!" lightly retorted the one they had called Jane Cross. "The back door's locked, and here's the key of the front"—showing a huge key. "Why shouldn't I go out if you do?—come, Matilda! The house is none so lively a one now, to stop in all alone."

"And that's true enough," was Matilda's quiet answer. "Little master Joe's here; he's been having a donkey ride."

The two servants, fellow-housemaids, strolled off toward the sea, taking Joe with them. At the edge of the beach they encountered Hannah, who had just come on with our two children, Hugh and Lena. The maids sat down for a gossip, while the children took off their shoes and stockings to dabble in the gently rising tide.

And that was my introductory acquaintanceship with the servant-maids at No. 7. Unfortunately it did not end there.

Twilight was coming on. We had been out and about all day, had dined as usual at 1 o'clock, (not to give unnecessary trouble,) and had just finished tea in Mrs. Blair's parlor. It was where we generally took tea, and supper also. The Squire liked to sit in the open bay window and watch the passers-by as long as ever a glimmer of daylight lasted, and he could not see them so well in the drawing room above. I was at the other corner of the bay window. The Mater and Mary Blair were on their favorite seat, the sofa, at the end of the room, both knitting. In the room at the back, Mary held her morning school.

I sat facing toward the end house, No. 7. And I must here say that during the last two or three weeks I had met the housemaids several times on the sands, and so had become quite at home with each of them. Both appeared to be thoroughly well-conducted, estimable young women; but, of the two, I liked Jane Cross best, she was always so lively and pleasant mannered. One day, she told me why No. 7 generally called her by her two names—which I had thought rather odd. It appeared that when she entered her place two years before, the other housemaid was named Jane, so they took to call her by her full name, Jane Cross. That housemaid had left in about a twelvemonth, and Matilda had entered in her place. The servants were regarded as equals in the house, not one above the other, as is the case in many places. These details will probably be thought unnecessary and uncalled for, but you will soon see why I mention them. This was Monday. On the morrow we should have been three weeks at Saltwater, and the Squire did not yet talk of leaving. He was enjoying the free-and-easy life, and was as fond as a child of picking up shells on the sands and looking at Punch and the dancing dolls.

Well, we sat this evening in the bay window as usual, I facing No. 7. Thus sitting, I saw Matilda cross the strip of garden with a jug in her hand, and come out of the gate to fetch the beer for supper.

"There goes Jane Cross," cried the Squire, as she passed the window. "Is it not Johnny?"

"No, Sir, it's Matilda." But the mistake was a very natural one, for the girls were about the same height and size, and were usually dressed alike, the same mourning having been supplied to both of them.

Ten minutes, or so, had elapsed when Matilda came back; she liked a gossip with the landlady of the Swan. She had her pint jug full of beer and shut the iron gate of No. 7 after her. Putting my head as far out at the window as it would go, to watch her in-doors, for no earthly reason but that I had nothing else to do, I saw her try the front door, and then knock at it. This knock she repeated three times over at intervals, each knock being louder than the last.

"Are you shut out, Matilda?" I called out.

"Yes, Sir, it seems like it," she called back again without turning her head. "Jane Cross must be gone to sleep."

Had she been a footman with a carriage full of ladies in court train, behind him, she could not have given a louder or longer knock than she gave now. There was no bell to the front door at No. 7. But the knock remained unanswered, and the door unopened.

"Matilda at No. 7 is locked out," I said, laughing, bringing in my head and speaking to the parlor generally. "She has been to fetch the supper beer and can't get in again."

"The supper beer," repeated Mrs. Blair. "They generally go out at the back gate to fetch that, Johnny."

"Anyhow, she took the front way to-night. I saw her come out."

Another tremendous knock. The Squire put his good old nose round the window-post; two boys and a lady, passing by, halted a minute to look on. It was getting exciting, and I ran out. She was still at the door, which stood in the middle of the house, between the sitting rooms on each side.

"So you have got the key of the street, Matilda!"

"I can't make it out," she said, "what Jane Cross can be about, or why the door should be closed at all. I left it on the latch."

"Somebody has slipped in to make love to her. Your friend, the milkman, perhaps."

Evidently Matilda did not like the allusion to the milkman; catching a glimpse of her face by the street gas-lamp, I saw it had turned white. The milkman was supposed to be paying court at No. 7, but to which of the two maids gossip did not decide. Mrs. Blair's Susan, who knew them well, said it was Matilda.

"Why don't you try the back way?" I asked, after more waiting.

"Because I know the outer door is locked, Sir. Jane Cross locked it just now, and that's why I came out this front way. I can try it."

She went round to the road that ran by the side of the house, and tried the door in the garden wall. It was fastened, as she had said. Seizing the bell-handle, she gave a loud peal. Another, and another.

"I say, it seems odd, though," I cried, beginning to find it so. "Do you think she can have gone out?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Sir. But—no; it's not likely, Master Johnny. I left her laying the cloth for our supper."

"Was she in the house alone?"

"We are always alone, Sir; we don't have visitors. Anyway, none have been with us this evening."

I looked at the upper windows of the house. No light was to be seen in any of them, no sign of Jane Cross. The lower windows were hidden from view by the wall—which was high.

"I think she must have dropped asleep, Matilda. Suppose you come in through Mrs. Blair's and get over the wall?"

I ran round to tell the news to our people. Matilda followed me slowly; I thought, reluctantly. Even in the dim twilight, as she stood at our gate in hesitation, I could see how white her face was.

"What are you afraid of?" I asked her, going out again to where she stood.

"I hardly know, Master Johnny. Jane Cross used to have fits. Perhaps she has been frightened into one."

"What should frighten her?"

The girl looked round in a scared manner before replying. Just then I found my jacket-sleeve wet. Her trembling hands had shaken some drops of the ale upon it.

"If she—should have seen Mr. Edmund?" the girl brought out in a horrified whisper.

"Seen Mr. Edmund! Mr. Edmund who?—Mr. Edmund Peahern? Why! You don't surely mean his ghost?"

Her face was growing whiter. I stared at her in surprise.

"We have always been afraid of seeing something, she and me, since last May; we haven't liked the house at night-time. It has often been quite a scuffle which of us should fetch the beer, so as not to be the one left alone. Many a time I have stood right out at the back door while Jane Cross has gone for it."

I began to think her an idiot. If Jane Cross was another, why perhaps she had scared herself into a fit. All the more reason that somebody should see after her.

"Come along, Matilda, don't be foolish; we'll get over the wall."

It was a calm, still Summer evening, nearly dark now. All the lot of us went out to the back garden, I whispering to them what the girl had said to me.

"Poor thing!" said Mrs. Todhetley, who had a kind of fellow-feeling for ghosts. "It has been very lonely for the young women; and if Jane Cross is subject to fits, she may be lying in one."

The wall between the gardens was nothing like as high as the outer one. Susan brought out a chair, and Matilda could have got over easily. But when she reached the top she stuck there.

"I can't go on by myself; I dare not," she said, turning her scared face toward us. "If Mr. Edmund is there——"

"Doh't thee be a goose, girl!" interrupted the Squire, in doubt whether to laugh or scold. "Here, I'll go with you. Get on down. Hold the chair tight for me, Johnny."

We hoisted him over without damage. I leaped after him, and Susan, grinning with delight, came after me. She supposed that Jane Cross had slipped out somewhere during Matilda's absence.

The door faced the garden, and the Squire and Susan were the first to enter. There seemed to be no light anywhere, and the Squire went gingerly, picking his way. I turned round to look for Matilda, who had hung back, and found her with her hand on the trellis-work of the porch, and the beer shaking over.

"I say, look here, Matilda; you must be a regular goose, as the Squire says, to put yourself into this fright before you know whether there's any cause for it. Susan says she has only stepped out somewhere."

She put up her hand and touched my arm, panting like mad. Her lips were the color of chalk.

"Only last night that ever was, Mr. Johnny, as we were going up the staircase to bed, we heard a sound in the room as we passed it. It was just like a groan. Ask Jane Cross, else, Sir."

"What room?"

"Mr. Edmund's: where he did it. She has heard him to-night, or seen him, or something, and has got a fit."

The kitchen was on the right of the passage. Susan, knowing the ways of the house, soon lighted a candle. On a small round table was spread a white cloth, some bread and cheese, and two tumblers. A knife or two had seemingly been flung on it at random.

"Jane Cross! Jane Cross!" shouted the Squire, going forward toward the front hall, Susan following with the candle. It was a good-sized hall; I could see that; with a handsome well-staircase at the end of it.

"Halloa! What's this? Johnny! Susan!—all of you come here. Here's somebody lying here. It must be the poor girl. Goodness bless my heart! Johnny, help me to raise her."

Still and white she was lying, underneath the opening of the staircase. Upon lifting her head, it fell back in a curious manner. We both backed a little. Susan held the candle nearer. As its light fell on the upturned face, the girl shrieked.

"She has got a fit," cried Matilda.

"God help her!" whispered the Squire. "I fear this is something worse than a fit. We must have a doctor."

Susan thrust the candlestick into my hand, and ran out at the back door, saying she'd fetch Mr. Lockett. Back she came in a moment—the garden gate was locked, and the key not in it.

"There's the front door, girl," stuttered the Squire in a passion, angry with her for returning, though it was no fault of hers. He was like one oil his head, and his nose and cheeks had turned blue.

But there could be no more egress by the front door than the back. It was locked, and the key gone. Who had done these things? what strange mystery was here? Looking the poor girl in the house to kill her!

Matilda, who had lighted another candle, found the key of the back gate lying on the kitchen dresser. Susan caught it up, and flew away. It was a most uncomfortable moment; there lay Jane Cross, pale and motionless, and it seemed that we were helpless to aid her.

"Ask that stupid thing to bring a pillow or a cushion, Johnny. Ghosts, indeed! The idiots women are!"

"What else has done it? What else was there to hurt her?" remonstrated Matilda, bringing up the second candle. "She'd not go into a fit for nothing, Sir."

And now that more light was present, we began to see other features of the scene. Nearly close to Jane Cross lay a work-basket, overturned; a flat open basket, a foot and a half square. Reels of cotton, scissors, tapes, small bundles of work tied up, and such like things lay scattered around.

The Squire looked at these, and then at the opening above. "Can she have fallen down the well?" he asked, in a low tone. And Matilda, catching the words, gave a great cry of dismay, and burst into tears.

"A pillow, girl. A pillow or a cushion."

She went into one of the sitting-rooms and brought out a thick sofa-cushion. The Squire, going down on his knees, for he was not good at stooping, told me to slip it under while he raised the head.

A sound of stalking feet, a sudden flash of light from a bull's-eye, and a policeman came upon the scene. The man was quietly passing on his beat when met by Susan. In her excitement she told him what had happened and sent him in. We knew the man, whose beat lay at this end of Saltwater; a civil man, named Knapp. He knelt down where the Squire had just been kneeling, touching Jane Cross here and there.

"She's dead, Sir," he said. "There can be no mistake about that."

"She must have fallen down the well of the staircase, I fear," observed the Squire.

"Well—yes; perhaps so," assented the man in a doubtful tone. "But what of this?"

He flung the great light on the front of poor Jane Cross' dress. A small portion of the gown-body, where it fastened in front, had been torn away, as well as one of the sleeve wristbands.

"It's no fall," said the man. "It is foul play—as I think."

"Goodness bless me!" gasped the Squire. "Some villains must have got in. This comes of that other one's having left the front door on the latch." But I am not sure that any of us, including himself, believed she could be really dead.

Susan returned with speed, and was followed by Mr. Lockett. He was a young man, thirty perhaps, pale and quiet, and much like what I remembered of his brother. Poor Jane Cross was certainly dead, he said: had been dead, he thought, an hour.

But this could scarcely have been—as we knew. It was not, at the very utmost, above twenty-five minutes since Matilda went out to fetch the beer, leaving her alive and well. Mr. Lockett looked again, but thought he was not mistaken. When a young doctor takes up a crochet, he likes to hold to it.

A nameless sensation of awe fell upon us all. Dead! In that sudden manner! The Squire rubbed up his head like a helpless lunatic; Susan's eyes were round with horror; Matilda had thrown her apron over her face to hide its grief and tears.

Leaving her for the present where she was, we turned to go up-stairs. I stooped to pick up the overturned basket, but the Policeman sharply told me to let all things stay as they were until he had time to look into them.

The first thing the man did on reaching the landing above was to open the room-doors one by one, and throw his bull's-eye light into them. They were all right; unoccupied, straight, and tidy. On the landing of the upper floor lay one or two articles which seemed to indicate that some kind of struggle had taken place there. A thimble here, a bodkin there, also the bit that had been torn out of the girl's gown in front and the wrist-band from the sleeve. The balustrades were very handsome but very low; on this upper landing, dangerously low. These bed-rooms were all in order; the one in which the two servants slept alone showing signs of occupation.

Down stairs went Knapp again, carrying with him the torn-out pieces to compare them with the gown. It was the print gown I had often seen Jane Cross wear—a black gown with white zigzag lines running down it. Matilda was wearing the fellow to it now. The pieces fitted in exactly.

"The struggle must have taken place up stairs, not here," observed the Doctor.

Matilda, questioned and cross-questioned by the policeman, gave as succinct an account of the evening as her distressed state allowed. We stood round the kitchen while she told it.

Neither she nor Jane Cross had gone out at all that day. Monday was rather a busy day with them, for they generally did a bit of washing. After tea, which they took between four and five o'clock, they went up to their bedroom, it being livelier there than in the kitchen, the window looking down the side road. Matilda sat down to write a letter to her brother, who lived at a distance; Jane Cross sat at the window doing a job of sewing. They sat there all the evening, writing, working, and sometimes talking. At dusk, Jane remarked that it was getting Blind-man's holiday, and that she should go on down stairs and put the supper. Upon that, Matilda finished her letter quickly, folded and directed it, and followed her down. Jane had not yet laid the cloth, but was then taking it out of the drawer. "You go and fetch the beer, Matilda," she said, and Matilda was glad to do so. "You can't go that way; I have locked the gate," Jane called out, seeing Matilda turning toward the back; accordingly, she went out at the front door, leaving it on the latch. Such was her account, and I have given it almost verbatim.

"On the latch," repeated the policeman, taking up the words. "Does that mean that you left it open?"

"I drew it quite to, so that it looked as if it were shut; it was a heavy door, and would keep so," was Matilda's answer. "I did it, not to give Jane the trouble to open it to me. When I got back I found it shut and could not get in."

The policeman mused. "You say it was Jane Cross who locked the back door in the wall?"

"Yes," said Matilda. "She had locked it before I got down stairs. We liked to look that door early, because it could be opened from the outside—while the front door could not be."

"And she had not put these things on the table when you went out for the beer?"—pointing to the dishes.

"No; she was only then putting the cloth. As I turned round from taking the beer-jug from its hook, the fling she gave the cloth caused the air of it to whiffle in my face like a wind. She had not begun to reach out the dishes."

"How long were you away?"

"I don't know exactly," she answered, with a moan. "Rather longer than usual, because I took my letter to the post before going to the Swan."

"It was about ten minutes," I interposed. "I was at the window next door, and saw Matilda go out and come back."

"Ten minutes!" repeated the policeman. "Quite long enough for some ruffian to come in and fling her over the stairs."

"But who would do it?" asked Matilda, looking up at him with her poor pale face.

"Ah, that's the question; that's what we must find out," said Knapp. "Was the kitchen just as it was when you left it?"

"Yes—except that she had put the bread and cheese on the table. And the glasses and knives," added the girl, looking round at the said table, which remained as we had found it, "but not the plates."

"Well now, to go to something else: Did she bring her work-basket down stairs with her from the bedroom when she remarked to you that she would go and put the supper on?"

"No, she did not."

"You are sure of that?"

"Yes. She left the basket on the chair in front of her where it had been standing. She just got up and shook the threads from off her gown, and went on down. When I left the room the basket was there; I saw it. And I think," added the girl, with a great sob, "I think that while putting the supper she must have gone up stairs again to fetch the basket, and must have fallen against the banisters with fright, and overbalanced herself."

"Fright at what?" asked Knapp.

Matilda shivered. Susan whispered to him that they were afraid at night of seeing the ghost of Mr. Edmund Peahern.

The man glanced keenly at Matilda for a minute. "Did you ever see it?" he asked.

"No," she shuddered; "but there are strange noises, and we think it is in the house."

"Well," said Knapp, coughing to hide a comical smile, "ghosts don't tear pieces out of gowns—that ever I heard of. I should say it was something worse than a ghost that has been here to-night. Had this poor girl any sweethearts?"

"No," said Matilda.

"Have you one?"

"No."

"Except Owen the milkman."

A scarlet streak flashed into Matilda's cheeks. I knew Owen; he was Mrs. Blair's milkman also.

"I think Owen must be your sweetheart or hers," went on Knapp. "I've seen him, often enough, talking and laughing with you both when bringing the afternoon's milk round. Ten minutes at a stretch he has staid in this garden, when he need not have been as many moments."

"There has been no harm; and it's nothing to anybody," said Matilda.

The key of the front door was searched for, high and low; but it could not be found. Whoever locked the door, must have made off with the key. But for that, and for the evidences of the scuffle above and the pieces torn out of the gown, we should have thought Matilda's opinion was correct—that Jane Cross had gone up-stairs for her basket, and through some wretched accident had pitched over the balustrades. Matilda could not relinquish the notion.

"It was only a week ago that ever was—a week ago this very day—that Jane Cross nearly fell over there. We were both running up-stairs, trying in sport which should get first into our bedroom; and, in jostling one another on the landing, she all but overbalanced herself. I caught hold of her to save her. It's true—if it were the last word I had to speak."

Matilda broke down, with a dreadful fit of sobbing. Altogether she struck me as being about as excitable a young woman as one could meet in a Summer day's journey.

Nothing more could be made out of it this evening. Jane Cross had met her death, and some evil or other must have led to it. The Police took possession of the house for the night, and Matilda, out of compassion, was brought to ours. To describe the Mater's shock and Mary Blair's when they heard the news would be beyond me.

All sorts of conjectures arose in the neighborhood. The most popular belief was that some person must have perceived the front door open, and, whether with a good or an ill intention, entered the house; that he must have stolen up stairs, met Jane Cross on the top landing, and flung her down in a scuffle. That he must then have let himself out at the front door, and locked it after him.

Against this theory there were obstacles. From the time of Matilda's leaving the house till her return, certainly not more than ten minutes had elapsed, perhaps not quite as much, and this was a very short space of time for what had been done in it. Moreover, the chances were that I, sitting at the next window, should have seen anyone going in or out, though it was not of course certain. I had got up once to ring the bell, and staid a minute or two away from the window talking with Mary Blair and the Mater.

Some people thought the assassin (is it too much to call him so?) had been admitted by Jane Cross herself; or he might have been in hiding in the garden before she locked the door. In short, the various opinions would fill a volume.

But suspicion fell chiefly upon one person—and that was Thomas Owen, the milkman. Though, perhaps, "suspicion" is too strong a word to give to it—I ought rather to say "doubt." These Owens were originally from Wales, very respectable people. The milk business was their own; and, since their father's death, which happened only a few months before, the son had carried it on in conjunction with his mother. He was a young man of three or four-and twenty, with a fresh color and open countenance, rather superior in his manners and education. The carrying out of the milk himself was a temporary arrangement, the boy employed for it being ill. That he had often lingered at No. 7, laughing with the two young women, was well known; he had also been seen to accost them in the street. Only the previous day he and Matilda had staid talking in the church-yard after morning service when everybody else had left it; and he had walked up nearly as far as Seabord Terrace with Jane Cross in the evening. A notion existed that he had entered the house on the Monday evening, for who else was it likely to have been, cried everybody; which was, of course, logic. At last a rumor arose—arose on the Tuesday—that Owen had been seen to leave the house at dusk on the fatal evening; that this could be proved. If so, it looked rather black. I was startled, for I had liked the man.

The next day, Wednesday, the key was found. A gardener who did up the gardens of the other end house, No. 1, every Wednesday, was raking the ground underneath some dwarf pines that grew close against the front railings, and raked out a big door-key. About fifteen people came rushing off with it to No. 7.

It was the missing key. It fitted the door at once, locked and unlocked it. When the villain had made his way from the house after doing the mischief he must have flung the key over amidst the pines, thinking, no doubt, it would lie hidden there.

The Coroner and jury assembled, but they could not make more of the matter than we had made. Jane Cross had died of the fall down the well staircase, which had broken her neck; and it was pretty evident she had been flung down. Beyond the one chief and fatal injury, she was not harmed in any way; not by so much as a scratch. Matilda, whose surname turned out to be Valentine, having got over the first shock, gave her testimony with subdued composure. She was affected at parts of it, and said she would have saved Jane Cross' life with her own; and no one could doubt that she spoke the truth. She persisted in asserting her opinion that there had been no scuffle, in spite of appearances, but that the girl had been terrified in some way, and had accidentally fallen over.

When Matilda was done with, Thomas Owen took her place. He was all in black, having dressed himself to come to the inquest and wearing mourning for his father; and I must say, looking at him now, you'd never suppose he carried out milk-pails.

Yes, he had known the poor young woman in question, he readily said in answer to questions; had been fond of chatting with the two girls a bit, nothing more. Meant nothing by it, nothing serious. Respected both of them; regarded them as perfectly well-conducted young women. Was either of them his sweetheart? Certainly not. Had not courted either of them. Never thought of either of them as his future wife; should not consider a servant eligible for that position—at least, his mother would not. Of the two, he had liked Jane Cross the best. Did not know anything whatever of the circumstances attending the death; thought it a most deplorable calamity, and was never more shocked in his life than when he heard of it.

"Is there any truth in the report that you were at the house on Monday evening?" asked the Coroner.

"There is no truth in it."

"I see him come out o' No. 7; I see him come out o' the side door in the garden wall," burst forth a boy's earnest voice from the back of the room.

"You saw me not come out of it," quietly replied Thomas Owen, turning round to see who it was that had spoken. "Oh, it is you, is it, Bob Jackson! Yes, you came running round the corner just as I turned from the door."

"You were there then?" cried the Coroner.

"No, Sir. At the door, yes; that's true enough; but I was not inside it. What happened was this: on Monday I had some business at a farm-house near Munpler, and set out to walk over there early in the evening. In passing down the side road by No. 7, I saw the two maids at the top window. One of them—I think it was Jane Cross—called out to ask me in a joking kind of way whether I was about to pay them a visit; I answered, not then, but I would as I came back if they liked. Accordingly, in returning, I rang the bell. It was not answered, and I rang again with a like result. Upon that, I went straight home to my milk books and did not stir out again, as my mother can prove. That is the truth, Sir, on my oath; and all the truth."

"What time was this?"

"I am not quite sure. It was getting dusk."

"Did you see anything of the young women this second time?"

"Not anything."

"Or hear anything?—Any noise?"

"None whatever. I supposed that they would not come to the door to me because it was late; I thought nothing else. I declare, Sir, that this is all I know of the matter."

There was a pause when he concluded. Knapp, the policeman, and another one standing by his side, peered at Owen from under their eyebrows, as if they did not put implicit faith in his words, and the Coroner recalled Matilda Valentine.

She readily confirmed the statement of his having passed along the side road, and Jane Cross' joking question to him. But she denied having heard him ring on his return, and said the door-bell had not rung at all that night, which would seem to prove that Owen must have rung during the time she had gone out for the beer.

So you perceive the inquest brought forth no more available light, and had to confess itself baffled.

"A fine termination this is to our pleasure," cried the Squire, gloomily. "I don't like mysteries, Johnny, and of all the mysterios I have come across in my life, the greatest mystery is this at No. 7."

But mysteries, like murder, will "out" in time; and the reader shall hear the conclusion of this one next week.—*Johnny Ludlow, in The Argosy.

side. She evidently suffered great pain while it was inside her, but it speaks worlds for the ease with which animals throw off lesions which few men could undergo without death, that in the afternoon of the day on which the skewer was dragged out Di was frisking about in her usual health and chasing rabbits in the wildest way over the woods and heath. The wound healed up at once, and all that remains of it now is a very slight scar on Di's side which you have to hunt for before you can find it.—Macmillan's Magazine.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—Seated in the centre of the table just before the Woolsack, is Lord Redesdale, Chairman of committees, conspicuous with the invariable swallow-tail coat and white tie, looking neither older nor younger than he did a quarter of a century ago. He is busily engaged in writing letters or in looking over official documents. On his left, in the place which the late Lord Lyttelton invariably occupied, is Lord Stanley of Alderley—in appearance marvelously like what Henry Stanley was, a couple of decades ago, before the traveler had developed into the politician, and was in the habit of starting off at an hour's notice for the wilds of Tartary, with no luggage worth mentioning but a pipe and some Turkish tobacco, prepared to dine with much satisfaction off dates and rice, and cold water. A good speaker Lord Stanley is not, and never was. He generally reads his speeches, and generally, too, in tones which it is extremely difficult to understand. But their substance is always admirable, and if the topic be distinctly related with the East—with Turkey, or India, or China and Japan, Lord Stanley's authority is weighty. Exactitude, knowledge, humor, and cleverness—these are qualties which he never fails to display, but too often at a time and in a manner which causes his audience to ignore them, and really robs them of their effect. Of the front Opposition bench the first occupant who claims attention is Lord Shaftesbury, a speaker—and so far as possible we now confine our remarks to oratorical qualities—whose sentences, indeed, are always well constructed, but whose argument is sometimes so loose and inconsequent as scarcely to deserve the name of argument at all, and whose enunciation is frequently so careless that he can only be heard by those who are sitting immediately next to him. At times, however, Lord Shaftesbury shows himself an orator full of fire, eloquence, and conviction. Next to Lord Shaftesbury is generally found Lord Coleridge, whose rhetoric, "honeyed with the oil of persuasion," what need to describe? Beyond sit Lord Cardwell, with pensive air and folded arms, seldom a speaker, always a close and critical listener; Lord Granville, the Opposition leader, radiant and polished to behold, with an air of genial langour about him affected rather than real, and a strength of nature which may well astonish those who are accustomed to regard him rather as a professor of deportment than a statesman; eminently uncertain as a speaker, sometimes giving the House nothing but weak doses of political platitudes; at others earnest, dignified, abounding in sagacity and wisdom. His near neighbor on the same bench, Lord Kimberley, is a statesman who is in his true element in Parliament—a keen politician, a fluent, perhaps too fluent, speaker, and abounding in cleverness and knowledge. The Duke of Argyll will probably be a better orator and a more influential personage ten years hence than he is now. His rhetoric has required and is now gradually gaining a certain mellowness, which is an immense improvement. Earl Grey, who sits near the Duke of Argyll, his head inclined slightly forward so as not to lose a word which is said—and whatever the subject of discussion his attention is invariably the same and never flags—frequently regards it as a duty to play the part of advocatus diaboli to any measure which may be before the House. But aggressive though his criticism may be, it is always to the point, and he inherits many of the attributes which were conspicuous in his father, the Premier of that Administration which passed the first Reform bill. His voice is still clear and strong. His common sense immediately supplies the solvent before which mere plausibility disappears—a common sense that comes not only of experience but of vigor, and is full of a force which is tempered and not diminished by age. On the bench immediately behind that on which the Opposition leaders are seated, the most conspicuous personage is the Duke of Somerset, perhaps on the whole the most pungent, witty, and incisive speaker of whom the House of Lords can boast. His style, indeed, is rather that which we might expect, but which at present we should look for in vain, in the House of Commons. No one is more quick to detect imposition, far to strip it of its veneer of fine phrases and fair promises, than this free-thinking, hard-hitting peer. Unfortunately his Parliamentary utterances cannot be heard from the strangers' gallery, and the reporters follow him with difficulty. Still they do follow him; and his speeches will bear the test of careful study even in their summarized form. The representative character of the House of Lords has been already dwelt upon in the course of this article. There is certainly no member of the House of Commons who so thoroughly represents the educated, popular, destructive, critical spirit of the age as his Grace of Somerset. Lord Campbell and Stratheden is the last peer on the Liberal side on whom it is necessary to say a few words. If Lord Campbell did himself justice, he would long ago have made a far greater mark in Parliamentary life than he seems likely to do. On foreign politics, and especially on the politics of Southeastern Europe, he is more thoroughly and accurately informed than almost any of the Opposition peers, unless it be Lord Napier. Lord Campbell is, moreover, master of a literary style whose only defect is occasional obscurity generated by a straining after epigrammatic point, and an overwrought refinement of expression. But Lord Campbell, notwithstanding the copiousness and exactness of his knowledge, his unrivaled mastery of blue-books, and his memory for the text of treaties and protocols, is an ineffective speaker. He is listened to in spite of himself, because what he says is known to be worth hearing. Happily, Lord Campbell is in the habit of printing his more important speeches, and the world is thus supplied with what are really valuable manuals of political teaching. With debating power the Conservative benches in the House of Lords are, as has been said, much more plentifully furnished than the Whig or Liberal side. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon, who will now resign his leadership only to the newly-elevated Prime Minister, has always done his work discreetly. He has, in fact, done all that was wanted of him. He has never failed to make a Ministerial statement, however complicated the subject, in a clear and business-like manner. He has been uniformly courteous to his opponents, and is thoroughly trusted by his colleagues. Political influence, beyond what must attach to the possessor of a couple of dukedoms, he has had, and aspires to have, none. The great defect in Lord Derby, as a speaker, is the prominence of Lancashire in his accent. It is here alone that he reminds one of his father, in whom the same peculiarity was apparent, especially in moments of political passion and excitement. He never hesitates, and has no varied inflections of tone, and consequently never soars to the height of the orator. He appeals to the reason and judgment of his hearers, whether in Parliament or out of it. Lord Carnarvon's voice is weak, as his figure is slight, but he employs it to the utmost advantage, and without any semblance of painful effort. Not a word that he says is ever lost, and in the spirit and vigor with which his sentences are delivered, as well as the admirable form into which they are thrown, one forgets the physical disadvantages of the Colonial Secretary. A true statesman Lord Carnarvon has shown himself; had nature been more lavish in her vocal gifts, he would been a great orator. As it is, he has a perfect idea of what oratory should be, and does his best to reproduce its effects. Between the speaking of Lord Carnarvon and Lord Salisbury there are certain points of resemblance. In both there is the same tinge of academic culture; the same use of telling and incisive phrase; the same studied advoidance of the conventional and the commonplace. Lord Salisbury's voice is extremely powerful, and the merest stranger would not have heard 20 words from him before he perceived that they were the utterance of a correspondingly powerful mind. The Indian Secretary possesses in a greater degree than any of his colleagues, or, indeed, than any of his opponents, except Lord Selborne, the power of replying to a whole series of speeches on their general merits, leaving not a point in any one of them unnoticed, and on doing this without having previously taken a single note or jotted down a single fact as an aide mémoire. He is, in brief, a master of Parliamentary debate, as he is a master also of sarcasm and irony. These qualities he displays less frequently than formerly, but he has not lost the use of them. Possibly they are reserved for the period when he may again be in opposition. At present he cultivates something approaching even to geniality, though the addiction to stinging phrases and crushing retorts is manifestly suppressed with difficulty. —Fraser's Magazine.

CHARLES KINGSLEY ON "MUSCULAR CHRISTIANITY."—About this time, Kingsley evinced a curious irritability on the last-named matter. Let him speak for himself in a remarkable letter written in February of this year to one then unknown to him, who afterward became his friend; and who had contributed some papers to the magazine, one of which touched the sore subject. This letter sets forth the fullest statement known to me of his views upon it:

EVERSLEY, Feb. 15, '60.

DEAR SIR: Were you not so charming a writer; and one whom I long to know and to thank in person, I should not trouble you or myself by writing this. But. In an essay of yours which seems to me one of your very best; and in every word of which I agree, I find (p. 250–251) talk which pains me bitterly, about muscular Christianity. Now—I am called by noodles and sneerers the head of that school. When muscular Christianity is spoken of either Tom Hughes or I rise to most folks' minds. Tom may take care of himself; for me, I say this. I consider the term as silly and offensive. Whenever any man makes use of it to me I ignore the whole matter, and if I be troubled give him to understand that he is rude. And for this reason. It is all a dream, as far as I am concerned, about muscular Christianity. The best folk I know or ever shall know, have been poor cripples, noodles, ugly women, and that sort of "off-scouring of humanity"—whom the Lord loved, because there is no form nor comeliness in them, to make men love them. Then, because I tell the handsome women and the strong men, "Why are you not as good as these poor wretches? You can and ought to be a great deal better;" an insolent —— reviewer, or somebody, gives me the nicknamed muscular Christianity, and sets up the theory that my ideal is a man who fears God, and can walk a 1,000 miles in a 1,000 hours. I have my ideal—I have many ideals—which I shall keep to myself; but I confess I have never been more moved than by such talk to show the young pris, whoever he was, my muscular un-Christianity, unless my right hand had forgotten its cunning and of my position, people will demand more that they do now things that show some individuality in design, that are not made "in quantities to suit purchasers,"—that are not even to be had in pairs. Then we shall find the makers of furniture producing single pieces of single sets, into which the workman has put some special design which he does not copy in the next piece, even if he keep the general form. Design, and finish, and serviceableness, will be most considered, and cheap display—the bane of almost all our fashionable furniture nowadays—will be avoided. When a few rich people, who have an educated taste besides, will encourage the production of furniture that is worth admiring and keeping for its own sake, not merely because it is in the fashion, we shall see the turn of the tide. At present, there is hardly anything at all of this done even by the richest people, (I mean, little that I hear of;) and as for the general run of us, we don't so much as think of doing it. People naturally and reasonably count the cost, and when they find that it not only costs a good deal of money but a good deal of time and study to get a piece of furniture well designed they just won't try to do it, and fare as well as they can without.—Scribner's Monthly.

At present, there is hardly anything at all of this done even by the richest people, (I mean, little that I hear of;) and as for the general run of us, we don't so much as think of doing it. People naturally and reasonably count the cost, and when they find that it not only costs a good deal of money but a good deal of time and study to get a piece of furniture well designed they just won't try to do it, and fare as well as they can without.—Scribner's Monthly.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—Seated in the centre of the table just before the Woolsack, is Lord Redesdale, Chairman of committees, conspicuous with the invariable swallow-tail coat and white tie, looking neither older nor younger than he did a quarter of a century ago. He is busily engaged in writing letters or in looking over official documents. On his left, in the place which the late Lord Lyttelton invariably occupied, is Lord Stanley of Alderley—in appearance marvelously like what Henry Stanley was, a couple of decades ago, before the traveler had developed into the politician, and was in the habit of starting off at an hour's notice for the wilds of Tartary, with no luggage worth mentioning but a pipe and some Turkish tobacco, prepared to dine with much satisfaction off dates and rice, and cold water. A good speaker Lord Stanley is not, and never was. He generally reads his speeches, and generally, too, in tones which it is extremely difficult to understand. But their substance is always admirable, and if the topic be distinctly related with the East—with Turkey, or India, or China and Japan, Lord Stanley's authority is weighty. Exactitude, knowledge, humor, and cleverness—these are qualties which he never fails to display, but too often at a time and in a manner which causes his audience to ignore them, and really robs them of their effect. Of the front Opposition bench the first occupant who claims attention is Lord Shaftesbury, a speaker—and so far as possible we now confine our remarks to oratorical qualities—whose sentences, indeed, are always well constructed, but whose argument is sometimes so loose and inconsequent as scarcely to deserve the name of argument at all, and whose enunciation is frequently so careless that he can only be heard by those who are sitting immediately next to him. At times, however, Lord Shaftesbury shows himself an orator full of fire, eloquence, and conviction. Next to Lord Shaftesbury is generally found Lord Coleridge, whose rhetoric, "honeyed with the oil of persuasion," what need to describe? Beyond sit Lord Cardwell, with pensive air and folded arms, seldom a speaker, always a close and critical listener; Lord Granville, the Opposition leader, radiant and polished to behold, with an air of genial langour about him affected rather than real, and a strength of nature which may well astonish those who are accustomed to regard him rather as a professor of deportment than a statesman; eminently uncertain as a speaker, sometimes giving the House nothing but weak doses of political platitudes; at others earnest, dignified, abounding in sagacity and wisdom. His near neighbor on the same bench, Lord Kimberley, is a statesman who is in his true element in Parliament—a keen politician, a fluent, perhaps too fluent, speaker, and abounding in cleverness and knowledge. The Duke of Argyll will probably be a better orator and a more influential personage ten years hence than he is now. His rhetoric has required and is now gradually gaining a certain mellowness, which is an immense improvement. Earl Grey, who sits near the Duke of Argyll, his head inclined slightly forward so as not to lose a word which is said—and whatever the subject of discussion his attention is invariably the same and never flags—frequently regards it as a duty to play the part of advocatus diaboli to any measure which may be before the House. But aggressive though his criticism may be, it is always to the point, and he inherits many of the attributes which were conspicuous in his father, the Premier of that Administration which passed the first Reform bill. His voice is still clear and strong. His common sense immediately supplies the solvent before which mere plausibility disappears—a common sense that comes not only of experience but of vigor, and is full of a force which is tempered and not diminished by age. On the bench immediately behind that on which the Opposition leaders are seated, the most conspicuous personage is the Duke of Somerset, perhaps on the whole the most pungent, witty, and incisive speaker of whom the House of Lords can boast. His style, indeed, is rather that which we might expect, but which at present we should look for in vain, in the House of Commons. No one is more quick to detect imposition, far to strip it of its veneer of fine phrases and fair promises, than this free-thinking, hard-hitting peer. Unfortunately his Parliamentary utterances cannot be heard from the strangers' gallery, and the reporters follow him with difficulty. Still they do follow him; and his speeches will bear the test of careful study even in their summarized form. The representative character of the House of Lords has been already dwelt upon in the course of this article. There is certainly no member of the House of Commons who so thoroughly represents the educated, popular, destructive, critical spirit of the age as his Grace of Somerset. Lord Campbell and Stratheden is the last peer on the Liberal side on whom it is necessary to say a few words. If Lord Campbell did himself justice, he would long ago have made a far greater mark in Parliamentary life than he seems likely to do. On foreign politics, and especially on the politics of Southeastern Europe, he is more thoroughly and accurately informed than almost any of the Opposition peers, unless it be Lord Napier. Lord Campbell is, moreover, master of a literary style whose only defect is occasional obscurity generated by a straining after epigrammatic point, and an overwrought refinement of expression. But Lord Campbell, notwithstanding the copiousness and exactness of his knowledge, his unrivaled mastery of blue-books, and his memory for the text of ORIENTAL CARPETS AND GREEK ARCHITECTURE.—A few years ago the carpets were almost all highly reprehensible. To say that they were barbarous would be to pay them a compliment, for no barbarous people ever made such crudities of line and color as the old "Brussels" and "ingrain" carpets showed us; though the "ingrain" designs were often better than those of the more expensive kinds. This was because fewer tricks were played with warp and woof in the cheap carpet, and the designs were more evidently structural. The objection to all the carpets of the former time, cheap and dear alike, was, that the patterns were too defined; whether "set" or "flowing," they could not be made to blend with what was placed upon them, but pushed themselves so impertinently to the fore that the carpet became the chief thing in the room, instead of being, as it should be, only a background for the rest. Of late years, there has been a great improvement in the designs of all carpets, from the most expensive Wilton to the cheapest ingrain. In the richer sorts, dark, soft tones with patterns—if patterns they can be called—of spots and stains, that now appear, now hide, but are never in the way, are to be bought in many of the shops. Some of the best English carpets are as thick and soft as the best of Persian make, and the designs, when they are not too daring, or when the makers are content with copying the quieter Eastern patterns, are a great improvement on the older manufactures. But, one may as well spend his money for an Eastern carpet outright as buy one of these English carpets. There would be the certainty of getting a design that had no taint of South Kensington in it and that would be sure not to be the same through any square foot of its space. For one thing Eastern art is valuable to us; it rebukes at every turn our scientific love of precision and symmetry, shows us the charm of irregularity, and teaches us how to make two sides of a thing alike while keeping them quite different. Whether we shall ever get this into our blood I don't know. It is an essential principle of all the best decorative art; and necessarily so, because all such design is as far removed as possible from mechanical assistance, and has no other rule or measure than the eye acting through the hand. No two Ionic capitals of Greek workmanship, even in the same temple, are alike in anything, except general size and character. No more are any two Doric caps alike, nor any two moldings of any style, nor any two successive feet of any Greek ornament. The notion instilled into our minds that the Greek architecture is all monotony and repetition is of English or German origin.—Scribner's Monthly.

HÆMONY.

"Among the rest a small unsightly root,
But of divine effect, he culled me out;
The leaf was darkish, and had prickles on it,
But in another country, as he said,
Bore a bright golden flower, but not in this soil;
He called it Hæmony."—MILTON.

A little dust the Summer breeze
Had sifted up within a cleft,
A slanted raindrop from the trees,
A tiny seed by chance airs left,—
It was enough, the seedling grew,
And from the barren rock-heart drew
Her dimpled leaf and tender bud,
And dews that did the bare rock stud;
And crowned at length her simple head
With utter sweetness, breathed afar,
And burning like a dusky star,—
Sweetness upon so little led,
Ah me! ah me!
And yet hearts go unconforted.

For hearts, dear love, such seedlings are,
That need so little, ah, so less
Than little on this earth, to bear
The tiny sweet blossom, happiness;
And sing,—those dying hearts that come
To go,—their swan-song flying home.
A touch, a tender tone, no more,
A face that lingers by the door
To turn and smile, a fond word said,
A kiss,—these things make heaven; and yet
We do neglect, refuse, forget,
To give that little, ere 'tis fled,
Ah me! ah me!
And sad hearts go unconforted.

I asked of thee but little, nay,
Not for the golden fruit thy bough
Ripens for thee and thine who day
By day beneath thy shadow grow;
Only for what, from that full store,
Had made me rich, nor left thee poor,
A drift of blossom, needed not
For fruit, yet blessing some dim spot.
A touch, a tender word soon said,
Fond tones that seem our dead again
Come back after long years of pain,
Lonely, for these my sick heart bled—
Ah me! ah me!
Sad hearts that go unconforted.

THE FROZEN SEA DISCOVERED BY THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—On reaching the northern outlet of Robeson Channel, instead of finding the navigable sea and continuous land trending poleward that they had been led to expect, the explorers found the land trending east and west, and that the sea was covered with broken-up ice of immense thickness and great age. The phenomena connected with this remarkable frozen sea, so unlike anything hitherto seen by Arctic voyagers, except by McClure off Banks Island, are of the utmost importance as regards the general hydrography of the globe. The explorers had reached the most desolate solitudes hitherto discovered. Marine life almost entirely ceases. There is no whale's food, no cetaceans, no seals, no bears, and no birds take their flight across the Sea of Ancient Ice. Its huge floes are from 80 to 100 feet in thickness, and the pieces broken off and forced upon the shore have all the characteristics of icebergs, fragments of these mighty frozen glaciers. They, therefore, very appropriately received the name of floebergs. Physical geography, like every other science, needs special names for new phenomena; and differing as it does from all other known seas in the extraordinary character of its huge floes, the Sea of Ancient Ice, bordering the most northern known land in the world, needed a special name to distinguish it from other ice-bearing seas. It received the appropriate and convenient designation of the Palæocrystic Sea, a term which will in future serve to distinguish the ocean which is laden with floes of enormous thickness and great age, extending for 1,200 miles from the coast of North America to the north shores of Greenland. In his paper read before the Geographical Society, on the 12th of December, Sir George Nares briefly ascribed the position of the Palæocrystic Sea in the hydrographic economy of the globe. He pointed out that a considerable body of warm water flowed from the Atlantic toward Spitzbergen, and a smaller one from the Pacific, through Behring Strait into the North Polar Basin; and that so large a volume could not be continually flowing into an inclosed space without running out elsewhere. Accordingly, in all other channels leading from the Palæocrystic Sea an icy cold surface current is running to the southward. The two principal cold currents flow down the east coast of Greenland and the west side of Baffin's Bay at an average rate of about four miles a day, as shown from the drift of the Hansa. This rate, however, is only obtained in the East Greenland current south of about 75° north, where a stronger current, coming from the north-east, unites with the Greenland current. Sir George Nares describes the Polar Basin as a locked-up bay continuing out of the narrowed North Atlantic Channel, with a warm stream of water constantly pouring into it between Norway and Spitzbergen, and cold currents always running out between Spitzbergen and Greenland, and through narrow straits between Greenland and America. Thus is heat and cold distributed over a great part of the globe, and the temperature of the sea on the border of the cold current, only 2,200 miles from the equator, is the same as that in the warm current, midway between Norway and Spitzbergen, at nearly double the distance from the equator. Before the Palæocrystic Sea was discovered by the Arctic Expedition the heaviest known ice was that which drifts down the east coast of Greenland and around Cape Farewell, and that seen by Collinson, McClure, and Mecham, pressing upon the shores of Banks and Prince Patrick Islands. At the north point of Prince Patrick Island it is lost, for Richards and Osborn found light ice along the north shores of Northern Parry Islands. Osborn, therefore, concluded with certainty that this light ice betokened a narrow channel, and that some protecting land existed to the northward. The discoveries of the Arctic Expedition extended for 300 miles along the shores of the Palæocrystic Sea, leaving 400 miles unknown from Aldrich's furthest to Ireland's Eye off the north point of Prince Patrick's Island, and 509 from Beaumont's furthest to Cape Bismarck. Sir George Nares and his officers were on this Sea of Ancient Ice for eleven months. They examined it and all the phenomena connected with it, explored its shore for 300 miles, and penetrated into its labyrinths of floes and hummock ridges, until ten of them attained the highest latitude ever reached by human beings. By reasoning on evidence, which will hereafter be more fully set forth, Sir George Nares came to the conclusion that a very broad sea extends north of Cape Colombia, at least as far as the Pole, that the land trends south-west toward Prince Patrick Island, and that the coast of Greenland does not extend much further north than Cape Britannia. The probable trend of the coasts is indicated by similarity of tides between two known points, prevailing winds, and the nature of the movements of the ice. It is certain that there is a large sea, and that the sea is covered with ice during the Winter. In the Summer, from various causes, this ice becomes subject to motion by the winds and currents, and gradually breaks up into fields and floes which are ever decreasing in size as the season advances. Soon after the first week in July the whole pack of ice begins to drive backward and forward, according to the wind or current, its main course being toward the channel of outlet, where it escapes in small quantities out of the Polar Basin. Gaining more room as the season advances, the pack itself gradually breaks up, when any space left vacant is immediately occupied by the frozen masses, each field and floe struggling and forcing its way to get a clearer space. Toward the end of September the increasing frost begins to cement together the contending masses, and by November the whole sea is quiet again, the ice only cracking occasionally with the tidal currents. The new formation of ice during seven months in the year more than equals the decay during the other five. Thus the pack covering the Palæocrystic Sea is a collection of separate pieces of ice, moving among each other during the Summer, each piece grinding against its neighbor as the whole jostles its way along, slowly pressing forward toward the outlet between Spitzbergen and Greenland. Whatever quantity of land may hereafter be discovered, Sir George Nares considers that the area of the Palæocrystic Sea will be found to cover at least one and a half million square miles. The principal outlet between Greenland and Spitzbergen is not more than 300 miles wide; and by the largest estimate less than half a million of square miles of ice can escape in the year. Thus two-thirds of the total quantity would be left behind. But in reality very much less escapes, as is proved by the great thickness of the floes, which must be at least a hundred years old. The discovery of the extent and nature of this Sea of Ancient Ice, and the careful observations of its movements, of its tides, winds, and currents, and of all the phenomena connected with it, is one of the important results of the Arctic Expedition. These discoveries have thrown a flood of light on the physical geography of the Polar area.—Geographical Magazine.

SANTA CRUZ.—Santa Cruz de Tenerife is regularly laid out on a gradual slope, flanked by sterile, volcanic precipices and ravines, not so near, however, as to justify Humboldt's statement that it lies under a perpendicular wall of rock, unless his words are accepted in a figurative sense. Lest the people should forget the name of their city, a massive marble cross stands at the head of the Plaza de Constitucion, near the jetty. The houses are often of only one story, and rarely more than two, though a partial third story is not uncommon in the form of a tower surmounted by a terrace. The roofs are flat and offer a pleasant promonade in the cool of the evening. The dwellings are generally in the form of a hollow square, in Eastern style; one would not suspect this from their appearance on the street. From the outer door, which is always open until late at night, one passes through a passage, corresponding in length with the width of the rooms, to the inner door, which gives into the patio or court, open to the sky, and frequently planted with bananas, orange-trees, roses, and jessamines. Around the patio on the ground floor are store-rooms and offices; the family occupy the next floor, the rooms opening upon verandas overlooking the court. A cluster of small bells is attached to the inner door. When a visitor arrives he pushes it open; the bell sounds the alarm, and a shrill voice answers above, "Qui e'?" (Who is it?) Should there be no bells, the visitor claps his hands. As in Las Palmas, there are a number of the lower class who live in caves in the outskirts of the town. The Guanches or aborigines were troglodytes. At Gran Canaria remains of stone dwellings still exist, but the Guanches of Tenerife seem to have been uniformly troglodytes, and the custom of turning the numerous air vents or caves of this volcanic soil into dwellings has not yet been quite abandoned. Some of them have been improved by face walls and other "modern improvements," but their essential character as cave dwellings is unchanged. The windows of all the houses in Tenerife deserve especial mention. A massive frame like a box fits into the aperture, but unlike an ordinary casement, projects some inches from the wall. The blinds are heavily paneled with square bevels, and in the lower half of each is a smaller blind swinging out from below. This is called the postigillo, and plays a most important part in the uneventful lives of the inhabitants, especially the female portion of the community. Is any unwonted sound heard in the street, up go the postigillos. Early in the day, women with frowzy tresses, and children just out of bed, scarcely awake and entirely unwashed, lean languidly on the sill and gaze at the passer-by behind the postigillo. Later in the day the dark-eyed senority, her toilet completed, shoots dangerous glances from behind this convenient ambush, and perhaps drops it suddenly just as one begins to realize the charms it coyly reveals. In the evening the lover converses with her, standing under the half-raised blind of the magic postigillo, while she, seated on the window-seat, leans her round arm on the sill, and listens to the passionate words he utters in low tones, and perhaps with her fan coquets with another admirer across the street. The Plaza de Principe in the centre of the town is very pretty, inclosing a fountain, and embowered with plane and pepper trees. It is the great resort on fine evenings, and few others ever occur. A band of music plays very tolerably, although the romantic guitar tinkling in the side streets is more in consonance with the hour and the clime. One is surprised to see so many handsome ladies in so small a place. They invariably wear that most graceful of all head-coverings, the mantilla, either black or white, and of lace or silk. The ladies of Tenerife, having found a graceful costume for the head, are sensible enough to know when they are well off, and do not change it. Not until 8:30 o'clock does the band begin to play; it continues until 11 o'clock, when the "serenos" take up the cry in turn. This is the humorous sobriquet applied to the night watchmen or police, who every half hour sing out, often very musically, "Ave Maria purissima!" then they give the hour, and end with "serene", (all serene;) hence the epithet; for so almost invariable is the weather, it very rarely occurs that it is necessary for the watchmen to alter the cry, and sometimes when it is actually storming they still, from habit, shout "Sereno!"—Atlantic Monthly.

THE COMPASS PLANT.—It has long been known that there grows on the prairie-lands of the south-western part of the United States of America, especially Texas and Oregon, a plant which has the peculiar property of turning its leaves toward the north, and which, hence, serves as a magnet to the traveler when no other means is available of ascertaining the points of the compass. It is probable, however, from Longtellow's description of it as a "delicate plant" on a "fragile stalk" that he never saw it growing. The compass plant is a member of the enormous natural order of Compositæ, known to botanists as Silphium lacinitatum. It is described as a stout perennial plant from three to six feet in height, with ovate, deeply-pinnatifid leaves and large yellow heads of unisexual flowers, the ray-florets strap-shaped and female, the disc-florets tabular and male. It is also known as the pilot-weed, polar-plant, resin-wead, and turpentine-weed, the two last names being derived from the abundant resin exuded by the stem, and is occasionally to be seen in English gardens. The "polarity" of the leaves of this singular plant has been familiar to hunters and other denizens of the prairie, who, "when lost on the prairies in dark nights, easily get their bearings by feeling the direction of the leaves." But the first occasion on which is was brought under the notice of scientific men appears to have been in communications addressed to the National Institute at Washington in August, 1842, and January, 1843, by Gen. Alvord. The accuracy of the statement having been questioned, the General presented another communication at the second meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, held at Cambridge, Mass., in August, 1849, in which he confirms his own observations by those of other officers, all agreeing in the con

BUT FEW MASKERS ON THE STREETS OF PARIS—THE THIRD GRAND BALL AT THE OPERA-HOUSE—HOW THE POLICE INTERFERED WITH RECKLESS DANCERS—THE APPLICATION OF SCIENCE IN THE DETECTION OF MURDER—IS SULPHATE OF COPPER POISONOUS?

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Monday, Feb. 12, 1877.

We are again in the midst of the carnival season, which does not open in a very brilliant manner, and does not promise much for the future. Yesterday was Shrove Sunday, the day the maskers generally appear upon the streets, and when the sounds of the hunters' horns are first heard, but throughout the day I saw barely half a dozen of costumes, and none of the little boys and girls who have attracted so much attention in previous years. The only thing which excited public curiosity was the large carriage of the Valentino, with the announcements of the evening ball, upon which was perched a few acrobats and clowns. In the evening masks were so rare that a solitary polichinelle seated before one of the cafés attracted so great a crowd that it had to be dispersed by the Police. Saturday night M. Halanzier gave his third mask ball at the Opera, and it was the gayest of all, the most brilliant of all, and the most productive. It is estimated that the profits on the three balls will be about 150,000 francs. The outlay was not less than 250,000. On Saturday there was a better class of people in the boxes, and under the dominoes I recognized several well-known American ladies, who went, of course, to see what these famous balls were like. At times the lobby was very animated, and it was densely crowded throughout the night. The orchestra was under the direction of Johan Strauss during the early part of the evening, but Mètra came in toward morning to lead the quadrilles, and by his strains drew numbers of gendarmes upon the floor. The law steps in at a certain point, and every dancer who goes beyond the limits of decency is marched off to the station. It is about 4 o'clock in the morning that this part of the performance comes in, an hour when it is presumed that the femmes du monde have left the house to the femmes du demi-monde. As I left I saw a well-known Baron going upon the floor, and his face recalled other days, for he was once a pupil of Chicard, and one of the most famous of the can-can dancers of that great man's epoch. Many a nobleman has been taken off by the Police for his dancing in the last quadrille. The Duc de Grammont-Caderousse managed to get himself arrested every time, and his coach and outriders in livery went to the station in the morning to get him. The men thus arrested get out at 10 o'clock, when the Commissaire de Police comes in. Some years ago one of these Justices had two maskers brought before him in their ball costumes, and the first gave the name of Franconi. The Judge, the clerks, the gendarmes and all present had admired the agility of Franconi in the circus, and he was treated with great respect. "It is not proper for a gentleman of your standing to dance in that way, Mr. Franconi," said the Justice, kindly. "I let you off, but hope that you will not need any further expostulations." And who are you?" he said, brusquely, to Franconi's companion, dressed as a clown. "The Duc of Brunswick—reigning Prince," was the reply. "Fine him $5, Mr. Clerk," was the response of the Judge. The Duke's carriage and servants were waiting outside, and he and Franconi drove off together.

The recent murder of the little girl, who was thrown into the dry well at Bagneux, has drawn public attention from the affair of the "woman cut in pieces," and very little attention is now paid to Billoir. He has grown old and feeble in prison, and seems to be losing his reason. He still insists that the murder was committed in a moment of passion, when he was irritated by Marie le Manach until he lost his head, and that there was no premeditation. If he can succeed in convincing his Judges that such was the case, he may save his head, but will be sent to the hulks for life. The murderer of the little girl has not yet been arrested, but a letter has been received, purporting to be from the father, in which he confesses the deed, and says that it was done to put the poor little creature out of her misery. The old well was about 100 feet deep, and he supposed there was water at the bottom of it. He was horrified at the screams of the child, and, after listening to them in agony, he fled in terror from the spot. On comparing the handwriting with some letters of Moyaux, the experts pronounced it the same, but one cannot place much confidence in this sort of testimony.

This reminds me of a curious case developed to-day. For the past year two young and eminent chemists belonging to the French Academy of Sciences have been experimenting with the sulphate of copper. Their attention was drawn to it by the case of Moreau, the druggist of Saint Denis, of which I wrote a year ago. Some of my readers may remember that he was accused by popular rumor of murdering his wife, and finally justice took hold of the matter. The remains were examined by a chemist, who declared that he had found a quantity of sulphate of copper in the bowels sufficient to cause death. At Moreau's house the pharmacopœia was found marked at this substance. This was taken to be confirmatory evidence, and Moreau was condemned. When reaching the guillotine he turned, and once more declared, in the most impressive manner, that he was an innocent man. This case started the two young chemists at work, and they made their report to the Academy on Saturday. One declares that sulphate of copper in equal quantities to that found in the remains of Mme. Moreau is a natural ingredient of the human body; the other boldly affirms that no person was ever yet poisoned by the substance. He began by experimenting on dogs and then on himself, taking two or three drachms. He was nauseated, and generally vomited, but not poisoned, according to the general acceptation of the term. His experiments have so convinced him that he boldly declares that no one was ever poisoned to death by sulphate of copper, and denies in toto the conclusions reached by the chemist who made the analysis in the case of Moreau. Is it possible that we have to add this to the already long list of judicial errors?

In politics there is little that is startling, but a general uneasiness that is felt in all quarters. Every one feels that something is about to happen; that things cannot last long as they are; that M. Jules Simon will soon fall before the attacks of those who ought to be his friends. In fact, the Naquets and Challemel-Lacours are once more coming to the surface, and they direct their batteries not against the enemies of the Republic, but against those who have done the most for it, and who are now in power. The position of the present Ministry has been sadly undermined by these persons, and if they go on they are bound to bring it down. What is to follow? The Marshal President cannot go any further toward the Left than M. Jules Simon, and society gossip reports him as turning toward the Orleans Princes for relief. If he were to favor the Bonapartists or Legitimists, the Left Centre would be against him, but that faction is republican first and then Orleanist. If a republic is not possible it demands a constitutional monarchy. Last week the Left Centre was in very bad humor. "You orush us—you are crushing us more and more," its leaders said to the Left, "and you make it impossible for us to sustain the Republic by bringing forward men for whom we cannot vote. You combat the moderate men like M. Dufaure and M. Jules Simon, who are our friends, and with whom we can work. If you continue this policy there is but one result: You will force us over to the Orleanists." The moderate Republicans know very well that the Reds would produce nothing but anarchy, and yet nothing but extreme measures now stand a chance. This is extremely unfortunate for the real Republicans, the few who have worked so hard and so honestly, only to find their labor futile. Their work is being ruined by their own allies. They have overcome their enemies; they are now attacked by their friends. There was a report the other day that the Comte de Chambord was in France, intriguing for the throne, but this seems hardly probable. And it makes very little difference one way or the other, for the number of his followers is extremely limited. If the people are consulted the Bonapartists will win; if the choice has to be made by Parliament the Orleanists stand the best chance. There is always some fire where there is so much smoke, and I feel certain that there is something in the wind; but what turn events will take is more than any one can now say.

HOW CATS AND CHICKENS, AND QUAILS AND CANARIES FELLOWSHIPED—THE SMART FOX THAT WHIPPED THE DOG AND ATE THE GOOSE.

From the Dansville (N. Y.) Advertiser.

We picked up a few local stories about birdies and beasties the other day which we here and now put into history.

Here is a story which our veracious Deacon E. S. Palmes relates to us, and which we are therefore bound to believe: About two years ago one of his trusted hens hatched a brood of chickens, and they were domiciled in a coop in the garden. Close by, in an asparagus bed, rested a fine old cat, the pet of the household, with some new kittens. One of the kittens looked upon the chickens and loved them—loved them so well that it abandoned mother and brothers and sisters, and went to the old hen and asked to be admitted into her family circle and become a member thereof. Biddy clucked assent and thenceforward hen, chickens, and kitten mingled together in mutual sympathy and sweet accord. It astonished the Deacon, yet did his heart good, to see chickens and kitten rubbing against each other, and lying close together, and his favorite hen brooding them all with her wings, and the entire family acting all day as if kitty, in spite of her four claws and her fur, had been hatched from an egg. The curious affiliation has been kept up until this day. The kitty of two years ago is now a grave old cat, but from kittenhood to the present it has lived and roosted with the chickens and hens.

There are several witnesses to the truth of another story. The affiliation in this case was between a cat at the Hyland House barn and four small pigs. It commenced last Summer and continued for some weeks on the grounds and street adjoining the Hyland House. The cat saw the pigs, went up to them, made friends with them, and became their constant companion until they were shut up in pens. When they ate, the cat was always present, and they followed it about, running when it ran and walking when it walked, and each night the cat and pigs slept together in the straw.

Just before last heavy fall of snows a man in West Sparta, while in his barn-yard feeding cattle, heard a noise among his geese, close by. He turned around and saw a fox take one of them by the neck, sling it over his back, and start across the fields with it toward the Hartman gully, a quarter of a mile away. The man chased with a pitchfork, but the snow was so deep that the fox gained on him. So he called his shepherd dog, and showed him the game. The dog quickly caught up with the fox, but the fox dropped his goose, turned around, whipped the dog, and then took up the goose and trotted on again. The dog was induced to tackle the fox three or four times, and each time the result was the same as we have described—the goose was dropped, the dog whipped, and then a forward movement with the goose. The fox finally got safely into the gully with his goose, and probably never had a better opinion of himself than he had while he was cantering in the rear on the chase which that he had secured with so much risk and courage.

About five weeks ago a quail flew into one of our village yards and was picked up by a kindly hand and given to Thomas O'Meara, who put it in a large cage in his store. In the same room were two canary birds in another cage. The canaries wound sang and the quail would whistle in response, and so much reciprocity of feeling was manifested that after a time Mr. O'Meara transferred the canaries to the cage of the quail. The quail received the songsters with evident delight, and when night came, seeing them place themselves on a perch in the top of the cage, it hopped to another perch just below, and slept there. This it has done each night since, although before, in accordance with quail customs the world over, its roost was the bottom of the cage.

THE CAMBRIDGE-OXFORD RACE.

THE CREW OF THE FORMER DEFINITELY SETTLED—SIX OF LAST YEAR'S CREW IN THE BOAT.

From the London Times, Feb. 14.

The Cambridge crew for the coming race was formally and definitely settled yesterday, and, excepting accidents, no further alteration in its constitution will be made between the present time and the day of the race. On Saturday Mr. James B. Close, who is looked upon at Cambridge as one of the best judges of rowing the university possesses, came up for the special purpose of assisting the President in his final selection of the crew. On that day Mr. Close had the eight out twice. In the morning he took the men to Dilton and back, and in the afternoon, after some preliminary practice in the tub pair, Mr. Close took the crew for the long journey to Claythithe, and it is probably many years since such a hard day's work was performed as that on Saturday. The result of Mr. Close's visit has been to dispense entirely with the services of Mr. Holmes, of Clare, who may, perhaps, be more fortunate another year, while the selection of Messrs. Hoskyns and Fenn was finally settled. These two gentlemen are now permanently located at boat-race No. 1 and 2 respectively. Yesterday, Mr. W. B. Close, last year's President, arrived and took his seat at No. 4 in the boat, which now contains no fewer than six of last year's crew. Upon this occasion the crew left the boat-house shortly after 3 o'clock, under the supervision of two old "blues," mentors of Jesus College—namely, Messrs. Rhodes and Hoskyns, the latter being a brother of the gentleman now occupying the bow seat. The weather, however, yesterday being somewhat stormy and the water rough, the crew only went to Baitsbite. Mr. Close also being rather new to his work, no very long pieces were attempted. Having reached Baitsbite, with stoppages at Exchanger, "Charons," and "Grassey," the men had a rest on the bank, and on the return voyage they rowed a slow stroke to the railway bridge, whence they completed the journey home with two more delays, and arrived at the boat-house at 5 o'clock. The rowing was in every sense of the word satisfactory. A considerable amount of life was displayed, the only faults noticeable being a tendency to feather under water and a slowness in the recovery. The stroke set by Mr. Shafto is exceptionably good; occasionally he hurries forward before getting his arms straight, but in other respects his rowing, individually speaking, could scarcely be better. In anticipation of training beginning to-morrow, the crew weighed yesterday. The weights are given below, and the crew as thus constituted will undoubtedly be the one to which the fortunes of Cambridge on the 24th of March next will be intrusted:

HORSE MARINES NOT MARINERS.

The St. Louis Republican has the following report of a suit decided in the United States District Court in admiralty in that city on Wednesday: "In June, 1876, Buckley & Gaylord, as managers of Mabie's Circus, chartered the steamer Laurie L. Davis for six weeks to transport the circus, menagerie, and company on a tour up the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, the managers to pay the expenses of the boat and the wages of the hands. The enterprise was not very successful, and about the 5th of July the outfit was landed in St. Louis, when it was seized under attachment for debt, leaving the company principally unpaid. To save expense certain of the company had helped fire up, load, and unload, &c., and not getting pay, brought a suit against the boat for their wages, under the Admiralty laws, suing as mariners. Voluminous depositions were introduced in the case, which was argued in the United States District Court Tuesday. Judge Treat rendered his decision yesterday to the effect that circus men were not mariners within the meaning of the law, and judgment was rendered for defendant."

A BIT OF NEWS.

The Pittsburg (Penn.) United Presbyterian of the 22d inst. says: "A great smoker is never interesting in conversation. He would rather let his thoughts, if he has any, sail away in smoke than take the trouble to communicate them to a friend."

WHERE THE MILLION EAT.

NEW-YORK'S CHEAP RESTAURANTS.

WHEN AND HOW THEY WERE STARTED—DANIEL SWEENY THEIR ORIGINATOR—A GLIMPSE AT OLD NEW-YORK—ECONOMICAL CELEBRITIES OF THE PAST—FAMOUS DISHES—HOW FORTUNES HAVE BEEN MADE—THE QUAKER DAIRIES AND THEIR FEATURES.

Prior to 1836 old New-York had none of the cheap eating-houses which have in later days become so prominent a feature of metropolitan existence. Until then a sort of conservatism flavored the habits of every-day life, and men thought much more of domestic calm and comfort than most of their successors find leisure for in these anxious and care-corroding times. Except upon special occasions of political significance, commercial importance, or peculiar festivity, men who had homes expected to dine at them. Even the stranger and sojourner within our metaphorical gates might well deem himself no better than an outcast and a roysterer in the land, if he did not at the regular hours for meals hie him to the tavern or hotel that was his selected abiding place. That was practicable then, for the City had not spread to anything like its present proportions. Between soup and dessert one would have had time to traverse either its length or its breadth, and even for the noon-tide meal one might go home and return to business again without even thinking of lifting up his voice in ululations over a lack of rapid transit. The City scarce extended above Canal-street. Even on Broadway buildings were no longer close together any higher up than Prince-street. The Croton Aquedect was not yet dreamed of, and the principal supply of water down town was drawn from the pump and reservoir somewhere in the vicinity of where Centre and Reade streets now cross. A considerable business was also done in retailing, at two cents per pail, "pure spring water," obtained from the spring at the corner of Christopher and Greenwich streets. Daniel Sweeny, now a wealthy hotel proprietor, recalls with pleasure the fact that in his first year in America, before he was 19 years old, he made $900 selling spring water.

For such special occasions of business or pleasure as have been hinted at, there were restaurants, of course—comparatively high-priced places—except a few, favored of rich, exclusive old merchants, which were superlatively so. In them things were cooked "to order." The patronage was limited and largely confined to regular customers who generally thought more of the fluids than the solids when they dined away from home. Old New-Yorkers will remember as some of the leading establishments at that time Sandy Welch's, under the Museum, where the Herald office now is; Sanborn's "Cornucopia," in Park-row; Old Tom's, on Thames-street; the "Tontine," at the corner of Water and Wall streets; George W. Brown's, on Water-street, between Pine and Wall streets; Pearsall's, under the Fulton Market, and Clark & Brown's, on Maiden-lane. Something later it was that John Florence opened, in the basement at the corner of Park-place and Broadway, a restaurant so much more magnificent than any of its predecessors that the town enjoyed quite an excitement over it, and used to stare wonderingly at its appointments, which were then deemed positively princely, although such as would now seem quite ordinary in a first-class establishment.

The ice-cream saloons used to do some business in feeding women at that time, and from the remembrances of those who lived then it would seem that the fair sex knew then just about as little of what was good or what they should eat as they do now. Pies, cakes, and refrigerants were what they wanted, not the substantial food vended at the places which have been mentioned, and so, probably, the ice-cream saloons should, in strict propriety, be left out of the account.

Another class of public refectories existed—the coffee and cake shops—which at that early day dispensed, for little money, to printers and other impecunious but virtuously hungry folks, the mysterious coffee, the dyspepsia-laden cake, the oleaginous pork, and the nutritious but treacherous bean, even as they do now. One such place was Patterson's, at the corner of Ann and Nassau streets, where a good deal of Dan Sweeny's supply of pure spring water was consumed. Sweeny was a smart Irish lad, on the lookout for a fortune, and was the first to perceive the public want of a restaurant of medium class, where prices should approximate to those at Patterson's, but the variety of food, and its quality, should be greater and better than there. That was the kind of a place he opened in 1836, at No. 11 Ann-street, one door from Theatre-alley. His shop was very small and furnished in the plainest manner, but it did a rushing business from its start. Instead of the 30 or 40 cents then generally charged for a plate of roast beef, or boiled mutton, or anything else, in the established restaurants, he offered his meats, pies, and puddings at 6 cents per plate—tea and coffee at 3 cents per cup. It was a new revelation. Some objected that his plates were small, but experiment soon demonstrated that five of his 6-cent dishes were more filling than one 30-cent dish. The balance was in his favor. During the dinner hours one could only edge into his little restaurant with difficulty. James Gordon Bennett, Horace Greeley, Lawyer Mulock, Moses Y. Beach, Mordecai M. Noah, and Lewis Gaylord Clark were among his regular patrons. His manifest success speedily encouraged rivals, the first of whom was John Johnston, who opened a place on the upper side of Fulton-street, between Nassau-street and Broadway. It was a larger shop, but not in other respects any better than the pioneer concern, and did not take away any of Sweeny's regular customers. The number of eaters consulting economy seemed, however, to steadily increase with the facilities for their accommodation, and not only did both Sweeny and Johnston do well, "making money hand over fist," but equal success attended the ventures of John Sweeny, brother of Daniel, who opened a cheap eating-house on Fulton-street, opposite Johnston's, (where Currier's now is,) and a man named Rogers, who started another on Fulton-street, opposite the Fulton Market, (still going on under Sweet's management.)

In 1843 the few proprietors of these cheap dining saloons combined together and put up their prices to 10 cents per plate for meats, pies, and puddings, and 5 cents per cup for tea and coffee. Two years later Daniel Sweeny moved his concern to the corner of Duane and Chatham streets, where his hote now stands, and about the same time the Crook family entered upon this line of business. Samuel Crook first started a cheap eating saloon under the Fulton Market. He had no waiters. Standing behind a table on which was spread his stock of provisions, he would slice off the portion called for, receive his 6 cents, and hand over the plate to his customer, who was expected to carry it for himself to another table, and there peaceably devour his 6 cents' worth. That devouring process was not always attended with what might be expected under the head of perfect comfort. At high tide occasionally the water would be ankle deep, and diners would have to wade to Crook's serving-table and back to their seats, where they would perch with their feet braced up on the rungs of their stools. This place, it will be seen, was not the first cheaper than those of the Sweenys, Johnston, or Rogers, and could afford to be on the style of Spartan simplicity in which it was conducted.

Sam and Harvey Crook, nephews of Samuel Crook, next opened on Washington-street a larger and better place than any of the cheap eating-houses previously in existence. Their success is sufficiently attested by their present condition. Sam is proprietor of the large Crook's Hotel on Chatham-street, and Harvey owns the extensive and popular restaurant and saloon in THE TIMES Building. In 1846 Rufus Crook, (another nephew,) in company with Foster A. Pettit, established a cheap restaurant in the Journal of Commerce Building, corner of Water and Wall streets, and made it famous by the size and excellence of their apple dumplings—there are men now who, looking back upon those dumplings through memory's mellow haze, are ready to affirm that "they were as big as a man's head—nearly." Rufus Crook died worth $100,000. Pettit, also rich, still keeps a restaurant on Water-street.

Imitations of these restaurants of course sprang up in various places all over town, but were generally known as "cockroach dens;" but even they did a good business. As the number of establishments of the better class increased, these lower concerns generally dropped into the coffee and cake order. One exception to the rule of decline, however, was the eating-house started in Washington-street, near the Washington Market, by Smith & McNeil. They at first occupied only one little shop, but gradually they extended it by additions as the demands of their business increased, until now they have the largest cheap dining rooms in the City, and feed regularly between 5,000 and 6,000 persons daily. It was about 1848 that Gould, who now runs a place opposite the old Post Office, on Nassau-street, opened the Belmont Hotel on Fulton-street. It was confined to No. 133 when first opened, but adjoining houses were quickly added, until it attained its present large proportions. In good times, formerly, when under Mr. Richards' management this restaurant used to feed 5,000 or 6,000 persons every day, but the character of its business surroundings has changed. The occupants of the offices now thronging that locality are not such good and numerous customers as the clerks and storekeepers used to be, and an injurious effect has been exerted by the establishment of private lunch rooms in several of the adjacent large bank and insurance buildings for the accommodation of the employes and occupants in them. Owing to these various causes the patronage of the Belmont is now only about 3,000 per diem. This house was somewhat run down in 1857, until J. P. Richards took hold of it and by his good management reinstated it in popular favor. In 1858 he made it famous by his "strawberry shortcake," of which he was the original manufacturer for restaurants. He used to make 300 or 400 large cakes, worth from 60 cents to $1 each, every day, and originated the effective advertisement of stringing the emptied berry baskets in long lines over the front of the building and to the top of the flag-staff on the roof. At one time he had 45,000 baskets thus dangling in the wind, and when, twice a day, a man would climb the flag-staff to string up more, Fulton-street would be crowded with people witnessing the feat. After the baskets were out up the crowd would rush in for shortcake. Richards was a bustling, energetic, and impulsive man, and some of his acquaintances used to take advantage of his disposition to play practical jokes on him. By 1871 Richards had made $200,000 in the Belmont restaurant. Then he sold out there, started the St. George—now the Continental—corner Twentieth-street and Broadway, and after many vicissitudes is again back at the Belmont. Quite a number of now prominent restaurateurs—in the popular line—were among his employes at the Belmont between 1857 and 1871, of whom may be noted Overton, now in Park-row; J. W. Merritt, in Ninth-street; Whitney Merritt, at Eighth-street and Sixth-avenue; Charles Merritt, on Broadway, near Twelfth-street; Theodore Reynolds, on the Bowery, near Houston-street; Smith & Green, in Cortlandt-street, and Barney Fowler, who afterward kept the place in Broadway, near Houston-street, since run by Coe, but now in Red Bank, N. J. Each one of these rose from a subordinate position to be Superintendent under Mr. Richards, and then amassed sufficient means to start for himself. Two of those named, Overton and J. W. Merritt were started in business by Mr. Richards. Now the old man has gravitated back to be simply Superintendent, in the employ of Mr. M. V. Cable.

There have been few of the cheap eating-houses that acquired special notoriety by any particular dish, none that did so to the extent of the Belmont on its strawberry shortcake, but it is remembered still that Crook & Petit's apple dumplings, Sweeney's bread puddings, and the buckwheat cakes made at the "Quaker House," on Dey-street, were worthy of the veneration of all true gourmands. Those buckwheat cakes were peculiarly fine, so large and light, and sweet and thoroughly baked were they, and, though the restaurant was but a small place—in the basement of an old-fashioned mansion—where they were sold, the proprietor amassed an independent fortune, mainly upon them.

There are now about 500 cheap eating-houses in New-York, and the capital invested in their conduct is estimated by competent authorities in the business at not less than $1,000,000. Smith & McNeil's is the largest place; next come the "Belmont" and "Continental," doing about an equal amount of business, and after them a score, or possibly more, each of which feeds 1,000 to 1,500 persons per diem. The remainder are comparatively small concerns. To tell any one that 10 or 15 portions of meat—say roast beef, for instance, each portion selling for 15 or 10 cents—are cut from a single carcass, would convey an exaggerated idea of the profits of the business; yet such is actually the fact, and some cunning carvers will even cut a pound of clear meat into as high as 20 10-cent plates. But it must be taken into account that the restaurateur has to furnish with the meat, and without extra charge, bread, butter, vegetables, sauces, and other seasoning; has to pay for services of waiters, cooks, scullions, and cashiers; has to bear the wear and tear of material, the heavy item of breakages, the cost of fuel and gas, the rent, and interest on original investment. So rapidly do these incidentals mount up that, it is averred by men in the business, the actual profit on a 10-cent plate—averaging meats, fish, &c., together—is not more than from a cent to a cent and a half. The secrets of success in the cheap dining-room business are, first, strict economy, and second, making a trade sufficiently large to give a respectable aggregate of the small profits. A restaurant of this kind to feed about 1,000 persons would use daily 200 pounds of beef, 20 pounds of pork, 75 pounds of veal, 150 to 200 pounds of mutton, 50 pounds of poultry and about 50 pounds of fish. Of all this, if the establishment is properly conducted, not more than five pounds will be left over at the close of the day. Waste is avoided as carefully as possible, but the means by which that is effected, especially in some of the smaller saloons, may well be left to the imagination. There are mysteries connected with such simple words as "hash" and "stew" and "pie" which none but the foolishly rash will seek to penetrate. In general, however, it may be affirmed that in no respect except the diminutiveness of the portions furnished is there much choice between these cheap houses and more pretentious and high-priced places. The better class of them keep excellent meats and take care to cook them as to suit their patrons. A share of custom must be kept on the alert by the popular restaurateur. Where on ordinary days he will provide no more than 30 gallons of clam chowder, and say 50 pounds of fish, his provision for a Friday or a "fish day" in Lent, will run up to 60 or 70 gallons of chowder and double his usual supply of fish—a fact that affords pleasing attestation to the extent of piety in the community.

Waiters get $7 per week, and are held responsible for all breakages—which they can be convicted of—but, as a rule, out of the $60 or $70 per month of breakages in a large restaurant, not more than 60 or 70 cents can be charged to the waiters. "The cat" and "somebody else" are the customary culprits. Twelve hours constitute a day's work.

Four or five years ago another variety of cheap restaurant bloomed into a fair share of popular favor, under the seductive title of "Quaker Dairies." Their distinctive feature is the rigid exclusion from their supply of refreshments of the wicked lager and the demoralizing new ale common to other popular eating-houses, and the substitution therefor of a peculiarly colicky sort of cider, cerulean milk, and weak tea. The bill of fare makes also a prominent spread of such seductive viands as "wheaten grits," and "mush and milk," and "oat-meal gruel," thick and slab. A large part of the popular appreciation of these concerns is attributable to their uniform employment of as good-looking girls as they can find to serve as waitresses and cashiers, and it is without doubt a happy illustration of the beautiful law of natural compensations, that the patrons thus attracted shall be nurtured upon materials declared best for brain building.

A SCHOOL BOY REWARDED.

The Philadelphia Ledger of Tuesday contains the following account of a well-merited acknowledgment of heroic action on the part of a school boy in that city:

"At the old Normal School, located on Sergeant street, between Ninth and Tenth, Harry P. Van Aken, aged 14, was yesterday afternoon presented with a handsome American hunting-case gold watch valued at $150, a copy of The Young Trail Hunter, a fruit-knife, and a gold pencil and penholder combined, as tokens of his bravery and coolness at the fire which broke out in the building during school hours on the 6th inst. Dr. M. P. Hutchinson, a member of the Board of Education, said that he himself had, through some misunderstanding, been awarded by the press of the city all the credit attached to the orderly manner in which the scholars had been dismissed from the school on that occasion. The facts are, Master Van Aken, a scholar under Miss McRaith, in the third story of the building, had been sent below on an errand, and while there discovered the fire a few moments after the speaker had done so, and while the latter was entering the classroom of Miss Cresson's school on the first floor. After the discovery, Van Aken, in a cool and collected manner, told Miss Cresson of the fire, and then ran to Miss McRaith's department, where he told her quietly that the building was on fire, and that she had better dismiss her scholars immediately. This was the first intimation she had of the impending danger, and she acted upon the youth's suggestion, and in a minute the scholars were outside the building. At the conclusion of Dr. Hutchinson's explanation, Van Aken was called before the audience, and the watch was presented to him by F. C. Garrigues, President of the Board of Directors of the Tenth School Section. In taking the watch Van Aken said: 'I thank you and the Directors for this most beautiful gift. I expected no reward, except happiness, for having given warning in time to save the boys.' The pencil was the gift of Van Aken's schoolmates; the book was presented by Miss Ella Browne, his teacher; and the knife by Miss McRaith. The watch is inscribed as follows: 'Presented to Harry P. Van Aken by the Board of Directors of the Tenth School Section, Philadelphia, for his courage and noble conduct during a fire in the old Normal School building, Feb. 6, 1877.' Master Robert L. Earley, who carried a lame boy down stairs at the time of the fire, and then returned for the cripple's crutch, was next the recipient of reward for praiseworthy conduct. He was presented by Miss Mary Taylor, his teacher, with a napkin ring and a volume entitled Fast Friends."

A LARGE ESTIMATE.

A recent letter from Dallas, Texas, to the St. Louis Republican says: "Last year the Iron Mountain and the Texas and Pacific Railways brought into this State 212,000 people. I have no statistics as to the number brought by other roads, by water, and overland in wagons, but the best informed residents and land men with whom I have conversed estimate the number arriving in the State for actual settlement at 400,000, and I think the figures are not exaggerated. There is so large a scope of country open to settlement by those who desire cheap homes that the great increase in population is scarcely perceptible. Within the past six months, however, the stream seems to have settled into a channel, and that leads toward Northern and Western Texas."

WELL NAMED.

The Lancaster (Penn.) Examiner of Saturday says: "Mr. John J. High, residing in West Earl Township, this county, deserves to be classed with giants. He is a young man, 18 years of age, height 6 feet 3½ inches, and weighs 230 pounds. Should there be any one in the county to compare with him, considering age, we should be pleased to hear from him or of him."

LAW REPORTS.

COURT NOTES.

Chief Justice Church, of the Court of Appeals, occupied a seat on the bench beside Chief Justice Davis in Supreme Court Chambers yesterday.

Judge Sedgwick, in Superior Court, Special Term, yesterday, granted an injunction restraining Hart Jackson from giving representations of the play of "Our Boys" at the Broadway Theatre or elsewhere. The injunction was granted in a suit brought by Augustin Daly, who is the author of the play in question.

Harry Smith, aged 14, a native of St. John, N. B., was arraigned before Justice Otterbourg at the Washington Place Police Court yesterday, charged with having attempted to steal a silk handkerchief from the pocket of Miss Annie Kaskell, of No. 1,247 Second avenue, while she was passing along Broadway, on the 22d inst. The lad was committed for that in default of $1,000 bail.

The parents of Frank Heller, a cripple 8 years of age, are endeavoring to regain possession of the boy, who was found begging in the streets recently and was taken charge of by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. He was sent to Randall's Island. His parents took out a writ of habeas corpus which was returnable before Chief Justice Davis, in the Supreme Court Chambers yesterday, when argument was had. The Chief Justice reserved his decision.

Anna Heller, who is 16 years of age, recently brought suit in the Superior Court against J. Christoph Pitschke. She says that she was struck by a stone which Pitschke threw at some boys, but which glanced off and struck her in the forehead. In an affidavit presented to Judge Sedgwick yesterday, she says that Pitschke has offered to compromise the case for $300, and that she is willing to accept the amount in settlement. Judge Sedgwick, however, dismissed an application for leave to settle.

The suit of the Western Union Telegraph Company against George Harrington, Thomas A. Edison, the Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph Company, Jay Gould, and others, was before Judge Sedgwick, in Superior Court, Special Term, yesterday, on a motion for the continuance of a temporary injunction against the defendants, but argument on the motion was adjourned for 10 days. The plaintiffs claim to be the owners of certain patents in regard to duplex and quadruplex telegraphy, and are endeavoring to restrain the defendants from suing on account of these patents.

WASHINGTON'S GREAT-GRAND-NIECE.

On application of Mrs. Ella B. Washington, a great-grand-niece of George Washington, Justice Dykman granted an order of arrest on a suit brought by Mrs. Washington against Walter S. Church. Church was arrested by the Sheriff of Albany County, and his return with Mrs. Washington's affidavit was filed in the County Clerk's Office, Brooklyn, yesterday. The affidavit, which is as follows, contains an interesting narration of the facts:

SUPREME COURT, KINGS COUNTY.—Ella B. Washington against Walter S. Church.—City and County of New-York, ss. Ella B. Washington being duly sworn, says that she is the plaintiff herein, and resides at No. 204 Columbia Heights, Brooklyn; that she is the great-grand-niece of Gen. George Washington, first President of the United States, and also of his wife, Martha Washington; that she is the widow of Lewis W. Washington, who was great-grand-nephew of said George Washington; that by virtue of said relation, she became the owner of many relics of said George and Martha Washington; that in consequence of losses sustained during the late civil war, deponent was compelled, in the interest of her family, to offer some of said relics for sale; that before the date hereinafter mentioned, deponent sold several of said relics to the State of New-York for the sum of $20,000, and authorized Walter S. Church, the defendant, as her agent, to collect and receive the said $20,000 for and on her behalf; that defendant agreed to collect and receive said $20,000, and to remit and to pay over the same to deponent on request; that thereafter, and on or about the 18th day of April, 1873, defendant, deponent's agent and for and on her behalf, collected and received the said $20,000; that of said $20,000 defendant has paid deponent only $10,606, leaving a balance of $9,394, which, with interest, amounts to $13,095 90, now due from defendant to deponent, for and on account of the collection and receipt of said $20,000 by defendant; that deponent has often and urgently requested defendant to pay the money due her on said account, but he has refused and still refuses to pay his said money, and has converted the same to his own use; that for the cause of action above stated deponent has commenced an action in this court against defendant, the said Walter S. Church.

ELLA B. WASHINGTON.

Sworn to before me this 13th day of February, 1877.

Notary Public, New-York County.

SUIT ON A POLICY OF INSURANCE.

Judge Benedict yesterday rendered decision in the United States Circuit Court, Brooklyn, in the suit of Kate J. Bayliss against the Travelers' Insurance Company, of Hartford, which action was brought to recover on a policy for $10,000 issued by the defendant on the life of William E. Bayliss, the husband of the plaintiff. In his opinion Judge Benedict recites the fact that the agreement of the policy was to pay to the plaintiff the amount of the policy "within 90 days after sufficient proof that the insured, William E. Bayliss, at any time within the continuance of the policy shall have sustained bodily injuries effected through external violent and accidental means, within the intent and meaning of this contract and the conditions hereunto annexed, and such injuries alone shall have occasioned death within 90 days from the happening thereof; provided that the insurance shall not extend to any death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by any surgical operation or medical treatment therefor of disease." The cause was tried before the court and a jury, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject, however, to the opinion of the court. The insured died on Nov. 20, 1872, having about a week previous been suffering from influenza, and subsequently from cholera morbus, accompanied by convulsions. He was then treated by a physician, and requested that an opiate be given him to cause sleep, whereupon he was directed to take opium, which he did. The defense contended that this was not administered by the hand of a physician, and that the death did not come within the scope of the policy. Judge Benedict, however, decides that it was taken by direction of a physician, and directs that judgment be entered in favor of the plaintiff.

THE CASE OF JOE COBURN.

When Judge Sutherland was requested on Friday to come down to his chambers for the purpose of hearing a renewal of the application to admit Coburn to bail he was unable through illness to comply, but promised to attend yesterday, and was in the office of the Clerk of the Court of General Sessions at 11 o'clock. His Honor explained that he had only come to his chambers to keep his promise, not to take any action in the case of Coburn. He contended that he had no power to hear the application in Chambers, the matter having been remitted back by Judge Brady to him, not as a Judge, but as Judge of the Court of General Sessions. The court was not then in session, and he could, therefore, take no action in the matter before the assembling of court on Monday. The only one of Coburn's counsel in attendance was Mr. Edgar M. Chipman, who on hearing Judge Sutherland's decision, communicated it to the prisoner at the Tombs. An extra panel of 75 jurors will be drawn in the Court of General Sessions to-morrow, and summoned to attend on Tuesday to serve on the Coburn case. The prisoner will be tried on one of the two indictments for felonious assault found against him. The maximum penalty on a conviction in either case is 10 years in State Prison. It is understood that Coburn's friends have dispensed with the services of some of the legal luminaries who figured in the proceedings on Wednesday, and have intrusted the defense to Messrs. Charles W. Brooke and Edgar M. Chipman.

A RECEIVER'S BALD SHOWING.

Danforth R. Olney was appointed, some time since, as the Receiver of the Excelsior Gas Machine Company, in a suit brought against the latter by one R. J. Tolles. Mr. Olney petitioned Chief Justice Davis, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday to be released from all liability as Receiver. From Mr. Olney's statement, it appears that he realized only $943 86 by a sale of the company's assets. The attorney and counsel fees, the fees of the Receiver, and the plaintiff's costs amount to the whole sum realized from the assets. Chief Justice Davis, in deciding the matter, says: "The motion is denied, and Albert Stickney, Esq., is appointed as a Referee to state and settle what the accounts of the Receiver are, and especially to inquire and report why it is that all the funds collected by the Receiver have been exhausted by attorney and counsel fees, and by what authority the Receiver has paid out such funds and has suffered such expenses to be incurred."

Speaker RANDALL yesterday behaved less like a heated and unscrupulous partisan, and more like the presiding officer of a legislative assembly, than he has heretofore done. He conceded at least that while holding that a motion to postpone the performance of a legal duty was perfectly regular, motions to interrupt it at any or every stage of its progress, were out of order. The distinction is rather a fine one, but in this case a perception of half the truth is better than disregarding it altogether. Thanks to this ruling and to a return to reason by a large section of the Democrats, the vote of Oregon was finally disposed of, and the vote of Pennsylvania was taken up. Objection was offered to one Elector on the preposterous ground that he was a Centennial Commissioner, and the two houses separated. The Democrats in the Senate were ashamed to sustain this silly objection, and it was voted down in that chamber almost unanimously. In the House a motion for a recess till Monday prevailed by a very slender majority, and the sending of the South Carolina returns to the Commission was thus delayed till Monday.

That the count will proceed without delay on Monday there seems to be no reason to doubt, and the Commission will hardly allow much time to be wasted over the Democratic return from South Carolina, which is conceded to be a perfectly untenable one. After that, the only objection likely to be made will be to the vote of Wisconsin, though the promoters of factious delay can waste time first over a frivolous objection to an Elector in Rhode Island, and following South Carolina, over an equally absurd one to a Vermont Elector. It will be seen that even though filibustering has lost its power for mischief, delay can be gained without outraging the verbal requirements of the Electoral law. The business community, which has everything to lose from the success of the revolutionary tricksters at Washington, should promptly recognize this danger, and make such a protest against plunging the country once more into a wrangle over the Presidency as will not be liable to be misunderstood.

Perhaps the surest evidence that the Democratic Party does not seriously intend to defeat the completion of the Electoral count before the 4th of March is to be found in the fact that the World has become one of the most violent advocates of the policy of broken faith and irritating delay. As a party organ the World has been specially distinguished for flopping over at the wrong time. It has been loudest in its commendations of Democratic trickery and fraud at the moment that less unscrupulous partisans were preparing to desert the failing cause. The journal which went over to TWEED before his fall, and sustained him till he was in sight of the Penitentiary, merely challenges public derision when it rants in this Cambyses vein, "Why should there be this tremendous haste in 'closing up' a count which, when it is closed up by the law and the forms, will yet remain forever open in equity and in fact, exhaling its pestiferous vapors to poison the atmosphere of American politics, and corroding by its exhalations the lustre of our national character in the eyes of all mankind?" And it has sufficiently characterized its own course when it talks about "the nauseous hypocrisy of people who, after twisting the sanctities of law to serve flat public dishonesty, are now trembling with terror" and impotent rage because their plot has miscarried.

In another column will be found a clear and concise summary of the leading points of reform legislation which a majority of both houses seem prepared to concede to this City. The chief difficulty in the way of a practical embodiment of these ideas is to be found in the multiplicity of bills introduced, in many cases for the purpose of throwing the entire subject into confusion and thus staving off the day of reckoning till another session. There are some bills introduced with perfectly good intent which should at once be withdrawn by those responsible for them. Among these is Mr. COWDIN'S bill for a Municipal Council of citizens and officeholders to report the necessary reductions in the City salary list. It is perfectly clear that no efficient help can be expected from the office-holding class in the direction of economy, and all suggestions emanating from that source ought to be received with proper caution. There are a number of desirable reforms in the direction of placing restrictions on the growth of the debt, of protecting property-owners against spoliation by assessments for unnecessary public improvements, &c., which are partially provided for in Assembly bill 168, but which need expansion and clearer definition. Some amendments made to this bill on the recommendation of the Corporation Counsel have rather a suspicious look, and should be carefully examined.

The Sun and World publish an identical report of Mr. TILDEN'S examination in the suit of BOODY against OGDEN and others. The report may, therefore, be accepted as one of the latest productions of the Bureau of Nincompoops, and was doubtless intended to place the defeated candidate in the most favorable light before the people. A somewhat amusing emphasis is given to the assertions that Mr. TILDEN appeared in "perfect health" and that his examination "tired him very little." This will be a gratifying announcement to the people who have renominated TILDEN for 1880, and is a conclusive proof that the true elixir of life is to be found in a long and desperate gamble for the Presidency. Mr. TILDEN'S senile garrulity is described by the following elegant periphrasis: "His replies to the plaintiff's counsel were often more full and exhaustive than was desirable to his interrogater," and his convenient lapses of memory are passed over in silence. If the Democratic organs are satisfied with the bearing of their candidate on the witness stand, nobody has any right to complain, but any one who reads a full report of the proceedings will find in them a fresh reason for thankfulness that the country has been spared the humiliation of seeing this shuffling trickster in the chair of the President of the United States.

A HOPEFUL OUTLOOK.

In the present position of affairs nothing is certain until it is accomplished. The time remaining is short, and the most careful calculations may be upset by an accident. Still, we cannot but accept yesterday's proceedings at Washington as the promise of a regular and quiet settlement of the Presidential question. The danger apprehended has not occurred. The Oregon decision, which seemed likely to be made the occasion of delay on the part of the House, has been disposed of; and the successive divisions upon dilatory motions, more or less disguised, justify the hope that the work of the Electoral Commission will be allowed to proceed uninterruptedly to the end. The crisis which on Friday night seemed imminent is to-day averted, and the legitimate result of the count assured. It would be unjust not to credit the Speaker of the House with some share in the production of this gratifying change. The severity with which we have criticised his general course, and the connection we have alleged as between himself and the extremists, strengthen the obligation to admit the equity and firmness of his rulings during the brief but excited struggle which preceded the close of the Oregon case. Whether or not he would have been able to change the current of events, had he chosen a different course, is an immaterial consideration. The fact to be remembered is, that at a critical moment the Speaker, who has been supposed to be identified with the policy of factious resistance to the decisions of the Commission, exerted his influence on the side of order and law. For the result which his judgments facilitated we are indebted mainly to a minority of the Democratic Representatives acting in concert with the solid body of Republicans. Without this help, the latter would have struggled in vain. Rendered steadfastly against motions which would have had the effect of causing delay, it determined the action of the House and frustrated the known purposes of the more violent Democrats. There is further encouragement in the superior character and intellect of the men who, in a great emergency, thus severed themselves from the majority of their party, and, without surrendering their preferences or convictions, insisted upon the acceptance in good faith of the verdict of the Commission.

The event has a significance much wider than the issue immediately involved. A grateful recognition of service would be deserved if the service itself decided nothing more than the question whether, on the 5th of March, Gov. HAYES shall be installed in the Presidency, or whether the failure of a regular election shall be followed by renewed and disastrous strife. But much more than this has been gained. The division in the Democratic ranks between conservatives and revolutionists, foreshadowed in the sayings and doings of the various caucuses, is an accomplished fact. And it is rendered more remarkable by the sectional aspect of the division which the votes reveal. We are not required to put a forced construction upon signs or motives. What is apparent on the surface is, that the moderate element in the Democratic Party has asserted itself against the revolutionists, and that this element derives most of its distinctive importance from its connection with the Southern States. If the country is not now menaced with the perils of a fresh contest for the Presidency, the circumstance is attributable to the honorable interpretation of an implied pledge and the patriotic superiority to the base arts of partisanship which have distinguished many of the Southern Democrats. They have risen above the level of their party, and have laid the foundation of an alliance which should outlive the immediate occasion for it.

The Hayes administration, if it fulfill the expectations of its disinterested friends, will mark the beginning of a new era in our politics. It will encounter difficulties where, under other circumstances, it might have looked for support. Attempts will undoubtedly be made to thrust it into the well-worn party ruts, and to fasten upon it the old party burdens. Men who did nothing to assist Gov. HAYES in the canvass, but on the contrary did all they could unseen to defeat him, will set up claims to his confidence and to his consideration in the dispensation of patronage. They will ask him to identify himself with the worst features of the policy they have in every instance sustained. The character of the President elect, his known sympathies and purposes, are a guarantee that he will correctly appreciate the motives of those who thus approach him, and will pursue the path indicated by his own instincts and judgment, regardless of their entreaties and their threats. They will not dare to oppose him openly, but their constrained support will be a sorry reliance in the hour of need. Gov. HAYES' duty in regard to these matters would be the same whatever might be the effect upon the working of his office. He will be sustained in its discharge, however, by the known approval of independent politicians, and of thoughtful, high-toned men who cannot be classed among politicians, who helped him cordially during the canvass, and now look trustfully toward his direction of the Government. The coldness of insincere adherents will be more than compensated for by the warmth of honest, unselfish friends. The result to be hoped for is such an accession of independent strength as shall turn the evenly-balanced scale in the House in his favor, and shall so establish harmony between his administration and both branches of Congress.

We should overstep the truth if we referred to yesterday's triumph of moderation and law as an assurance that the requisite support will be forthcoming. The party conditions of the next House will, however, be more favorable than those which now exist, and it is, therefore, not unreasonable to suppose that a result which has been reached under adverse circumstances will be attainable when the Democratic mastery depends upon only eight votes. The moderates will then hold the balance of power. And, apart from its immediate consequences, the action we now chronicle challenges attention as evidence of the operation of influences among a certain class of the Southern members which may affect materially the policy and fortunes of the incoming Administration.

THE FUTURE SUBURBS OF NEW-YORK

The subject which we recently discussed in these columns, of the "deep lot" in the laying out of New-York, has been presented in a new aspect by the well-known landscape architect of the Central Park, Mr. OLMSTED, in a recent report to the Board of Public Parks. It is fortunate for the City that in nearly all its important departments, are quiet men, either of genius for their work or of a life-long experience, who do the real labor of the community, while the politicians over them reap the honor and the larger present reward. But their work and name endure, while the demagogues are forgotten. Mr. OLMSTED reports officially to his presiding officer, MARTIN, the land speculator, who can probably no more appreciate the laws of art than he could those of philology. To New-York, the views of the artist are alone of any importance, while those which may be entertained by such men as TAPPEN to guide the Board of Parks may be dropped out of view.

Mr. OLMSTED notices what we have already called attention to, the burden upon small property-holders of this arbitrary division of land into lots of twenty-five by one hundred feet. As an artist, too, he feels its unfortunate effect in the long, narrow rooms of our houses, and in the few sites permitted by it in the City for truly grand and memorial buildings. No such sites can possibly be obtained in New-York "as Rome gives St. Peter's, Paris the Madeleine, or London St. Paul's." Each grand structure can, by the division of land into blocks, only have sixty-six yards in extent from north to south. Also, there is great difficulty in lighting and ventilating a museum, library, exchange, or hotel, unless from opposite streets—if it be not on a corner—or unless a whole block be occupied. Worst of all, this block arrangement compels every house to deposit and deliver its garbage and ashes in front. If, on the other hand, the blocks were cut with little lanes, as in Boston, the streets would be delivered of half their present nuisances, and the air of each dwelling-house of some of the gases which now poison its atmosphere.

The especial object, however, of the architect of the Central Park, in his discussion of this subject, is to recommend a new mode of dividing land in the part of the City which has yet to be laid out. This district is described as the larger part of the great promontory reaching from South Yonkers, and terminating three miles to the southward in the abrupt headland of Spuyten Duyvil. Its ridge-line is generally about 200 feet in elevation, and at its highest point, it is 232 feet above tide-water. It is a rugged, wooded, romantic region, peculiarly unfitting it for the stiff parallelogram treatment, and adapting it for a more picturesque and natural laying-out, in view of its steep declivities and romantic views, and the excessive difficulty of cutting it up into regular blocks of 200 feet, Mr. OLMSTED makes the ingenious suggestion that it be prepared for what is so much needed near New-York, and what is such a favorite thing near London and Paris—a "suburban quarter." His assumption is, that always in a large city a considerable number of persons are to be found to whom it is a necessity to live in semi-rural conditions, but who must be near their places of business. "Rapid transit" would transfer the dwellers in this district to Wall street in just about the time the railroads do from a similar quarter in Hampstead or Highgate to the "City," in London. Like those quarters, he would lay out the Westchester district in "terraces," with crescent-shaped or winding roads, with irregular lots, preserving old trees, picturesque rocks, and natural beauties, leaving spaces for pretty villas and their gardens, and here and there a green quadrangle for a college, or a terrace with wide outlook over the Hudson, or its parallel valley for a suburban boarding-house or hotel. He says justly that no more beautiful or attractive region exists in America near a large city for suburban villas. In his judgment, such a locality, so well adapted for walking and driving, would attract many wealthy people as residents, and soon, by its superior advantages, sufficiently raise the value of the land to compensate for the apparent loss of money in abandoning the deep-lot and block divisions.

The whole proposal seems to us to be the beginning of better things in the artistic methods of laying out our suburbs. The "boulevard plan" has become a burden and a nuisance to many of the districts near New-York, completely spoiling quiet, pretty rural scenes, and burdening the taxpayers with heavy taxes. The deep-lot plan, very convenient indeed in a plain, has been tried sufficiently. We need now some more picturesque effects. The land comprised in the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards is peculiarly adapted for a new treatment. A suburban quarter for New-York is precisely what it wants to make its attractions more like those of the European capitals. The expense of the new plans would not probably be much greater than under the rectangular system, and New-York would retain something which would have in itself all the attraction and beauty of a park. We confess, however, with the mistaken greed of the property-holders on the one side, and such judges of art as the Park Commissioners and the Aldermen on the other, we have not much hope for its adoption.

PHANTOM FORTUNES.

On the borders of Suffolk and Essex, two miles from the old English market town of Lavenham, whose parish church, renowned for its exquisite tracery work and carving, is a monument of the pious munificence of the DE VERES, stood at the close of the last century a sumptuous and stately mansion called Acton Place, razed to the ground more than forty years ago. It was not at that time an old house by any means, having only been erected about 1720 by ROBERT JENNENS, who had purchased the estate. This gentleman was a member of one of the first families who grew wealthy in the Birmingham trade. His father, HUMPHREY, acquired an enormous fortune in that town by button making and other metal work, and took up his abode at Erdington Hall in the neighborhood. He left several sons, who appear to have had souls above buttons, and set up as gentlemen, although we believe that the descendants of his brother make buttons at Birmingham to this hour. CHARLES JENNENS—HUMPHREY'S eldest son who attained manhood—married into the old Norman family of BURDETT—the same of which the Baroness BURDETT-COUTTS is so worthy a scion—and seated himself at Gopsall in Leicestershire.

ROBERT, brother of CHARLES, seems to have resided in London, and to have been much in the Army; he was aide de camp to WILLIAM III., and subsequently much occupied in real estate transactions. Although it does not appear that he was related to SARAH, Duchess of Marlborough, whose maiden name was the same as his, there was a close intimacy between them, and Mr. ROBERT JENNENS was largely intrusted with the management of the vast and scattered properties, and the investment of the enormous hoards which JOHN CHURCHILL and his grasping wife were daily accumulating. With both JENNENS and his wife—the descendant of an eminent Florentine family settled in England—the Duchess was in constant correspondence, and most of her letters contain an allusion to their only child, WILLIAM. This WILLIAM JENNENS was godson—some scandal mongers even hinted that he was son—of King WILLIAM III., page to GEORGE I., and lived thirty-eight years into the reign of GEORGE III. He inherited from his father, whom he survived seventy-three years, a large fortune, and probably derived more from his uncle, since it is difficult otherwise to account for his fortune being at his death so colossal, inasmuch as ROBERT JENNENS' letters to the Duchess do not indicate that he was more than affluent, and WILLIAM, though living far below his income, was not a miser, but lived at Acton Place in handsome style, noted for his luxurious table, and had a house in Grosvenor-square, the best place of residence in London. But at his death it was found that he had, besides large real estate, accumulated upward of two millions sterling, a sum almost unknown up to that date. When he died, in 1798, the dividends on most of his stocks and the interest on his mortgages had not been claimed for years. In his iron chest were bank-notes of 1788, to the amount of £19,000, and several thousand new guineas. He had never employed a regular steward.

A will was found in his pocket, but unsigned. His servant explained that Mr. JENNENS went to execute it at his lawyer's, but finding that he was without his spectacles deferred doing so. On what little points do our fortunes sometimes turn. This omission cost several people hundreds of thousands sterling. In the absence of a will the realty passed to the heir-at-law. This was the descendant of his father's eldest brother, CHARLES, of Gopsall, whose daughter and heiress married WILLIAM HANMER. By him she had a daughter, HESTER, wife of ASSHETON CURZON. They had a son, PENN. He married Lady SOPHIA, heiress of Earl HOWE, and that earldom becoming extinct, was revived in the person of her son. Thus the present Earl HOWE owns at this day the real estate of WILLIAM JENNENS. Now for his personalty In default of a will duly executed, administration with the will annexed was on 6th July, 1798, granted to WILLIAM LYGON, Esq., and Right Hon. MARY Viscountess Andover, the cousins german once removed, and nearest of kin of the said deceased. They were the grandchildren of his aunts, and a step nearer to him than the inheritors of the real estate, but not so near in direct male descent. The connection of his father and mother with the MARLBOROUGHS was brought to light by this devolution of the personalty, inasmuch as there was found among the papers at Madresfield, the seat of Lord Beauchamp, head of the Lygon family—a series of letters between the JENNENSES and the MARLBOROUGHS, which Lord Beauchamp published last year; probably at the instance of his accomplished father-in-law, the late Earl Stanhope, the historian. But it is notable that neither the Curzon nor the Beauchamp pedigree in the Peerage refers to the source of so much of their property.

Here, then, is the history of the man whose wealth is supposed to be awaiting heirs. From some inexplicable circumstance the idea got abroad that it remained unappropriated, and it must be presumed that certain cunning persons connected with the law have found it profitable to encourage this fond delusion. A quarter of a century ago the Gentleman's Magazine printed a statement to the effect that:

"The long-litigated case of the Jennings estate has been settled by the Court of Chancery. The property lies principally in the County of Suffolk, and at one period was estimated at £7,000,000, but only one-half of that amount has been divided by the late decision. Two claimants reside in Chelmsford. One, a journeyman painter, has received £500,000."

But next month follows an explanation to the effect that:

"Our correspondent, it appears, derived his information indirectly from the painter himself, who, much advanced in years, having been called to town to attach his signature to some document connected with the proceedings in his behalf, fancied that he had by his autograph secured the property!"

The editor proceeds to state that he had received a communication from the Jennens Family Association, from which he is led to believe that all the chancery "doubts" as to the rightful owners are not yet dispelled, and that all the claimants may still indulge the idea that have yet a chance of the prize. That claimants, here at all events, continue to do so, is evident from a recent paragraph in the New-Haven Palladium, of Feb. 3, where we read that:

"The American heirs of the Jennings estate in England held a meeting at Bridgeport, Conn., on the 31st of January, 200 being present. Competent agents will be employed to thoroughly prepare the case. The estate is valued at $30,000,000, of which $60,000,000 is in personalty. The English courts have rejected the claim of the English branch of the family."

We have no doubt of it, nor have we any that they will do precisely the same by that of the American branch. That somebody, however, has made, and hopes to make, a snug thing ont of this delusion we also feel assured. This sort of game goes on all the time, and it is but a few years since two rogues who had served in a lawyer's office, and while there contrived to obtain points in the family history of various persons, received for a length of time large sums of money on the assurance that they were agents of the Lord Chancellor, who had directed them to inquire into the claims certain persons had to estates which he desired to apportion among the heirs. If persons here who imagine themselves to be interested in English estates, had a grain of sense in their heads, they would subscribe an adequate sum, and then apply to the British Consul General to nominate some respectable Englishman, conversant with family history, and matters akin thereto, to institute inquiries, a course which would speedily elicit the truth.

ROMANCES READY MADE.

Those familiar with the life of WALTER SCOTT will remember that while in Rome, a short time before his death, he met the Duke and Duchess of Corchiano at a dinner given him by the eminent banker, TORLONIA. The conversation naturally turning upon poetry and romance, the Duke said that he had in his possession a vast number of records of the adventures, misfortunes, and crimes of the great Italian families for centuries, and that the author could use them for future works of fiction, if he would disguise the names so as not to compromise the descendants of the illustrious dead. How the offer must have inflamed the imagination of the poet! What magnificent material was there for multitudinous romances! With what eagerness he would have accepted the proposal twenty or ten years before! But then, unhappily, he was broken down with the severity of his labors, and died a few months later, at Abbottsford, a martyr to his inflexible and heroic resolution to pay the last farthing of his enormous debt.

What has become of those extraordinary papers? There is no doubt that the Duke had them, and was entirely earnest in his offer. They must still be in existence; it is less than forty-five years since SCOTT was in Rome. No writer so far as known has had access to that priceless treasure of topics. There have been endless Italian romances within that time founded on fact. BEYLE made a special study of Italian life; so did BYRON, though he never spent over a fortnight in the Eternal City. BROWNING has ransacked the libraries and monasteries of Venice, Verona, Padua, and Florence for themes for his muse; but none of them appears to have seen or heard of the Duke's collection. As yet it is, in all likelihood, virgin and untouched in a literary sense, and it is wonderful that it should be so in this day of excessive novel writing and ceaseless search after substance for book-making. How can it have escaped? Where is the host of scribes who, it might be naturally supposed, would still be toiling at this exhaustless mine?

It is impossible not to feel an interest in the records; not to desire to read them; not to wish to get acquainted with the new mysteries of human nature which they must unfold. They must be strange as any fiction, stranger probably, and far more alluring, because they are real; because they throb with actual life, and enjoy and suffer with genuine passion. We all know something of what the Middle Ages in Italy were, and to these most of the Duke's papers refer. A more pictorially inconsistent, romantic, licentious, and wicked period history does not include. Imagine the adventures, intrigues, plots, gallantries, poisonings, stabbings Corchiano's narratives would divulge! To think of them is to outline comedies and tragedies without end. The mind becomes an airy stage on which learned and treacherous prelates, profligate poets, murderous scholars, scheming artists, lovely women, hired bravos, conspiring monks, reckless soldiers, libidinous Popes group themselves, and move, and act, and melt away to return in kaleidoscopic picturesqueness, often dangerous, sometimes deadly, but always fascinating. The scene continually shifts from palace to prison; from the crowded piazza to the secluded castle; from the artificial, statue-bordered garden to the solitude of the Appenines; from the confessional to the banquet-hall; from the artist's studio to the shadow in which the assassin creeps; from the tapestried chamber, warm and sweet with lovers' kissing breath, to the dark river wherein the stilettoed body has just been thrown.

Out of the Corchiano manuscripts rise the ghosts of the Malatestas, stained with unholy love and pitiable from remorseless consequence; of the Borgias, gifted, beautiful, perfidious, and implacable; of the Gonzagas, powerful in war, but more to be dreaded in peace; of the Orsinis, poisoning and poisoned in turn; of the Cencis, branded with nameless crimes; of the Colonnas, destroying whatever stood in the way of their ambition; of the Bentivoglios, sovereigns to-day, and forlorn exiles to-morrow; of the Medicis, patrons of art and adepts in murder; of the Viscontis, learned, cruel, and destructive; of the loose, luxurious, unscrupulous Tazzis; of the Sforzas, mingling virtues and vices, as they mingled water and wine. All the beauty and deformity, all the sin and saintliness, all the culture and superstition, all the generosity and bigotry, all the heroism and tyranny of those contradictory centuries seem condensed in the pregnant records, and waiting for eloquent illustration.

Genius would not be needed to turn such fertile material into stirring story. The most ordinary talent would suffice; the poetry, the romance, the passion are all there; the tales would tell themselves, if they could see the light. In those papers are the fine comedy of fact and the stern tragedy of truth; it is philosophy, as DIONYSIUS, of Halicarnassus, understood it; for it is history teaching by example. Where are the enterprising novelists of the New and Old Worlds that they should thus long have neglected the splendid opportunities Rome affords? All the movement, startling incident, and varied complication of CALDERON'S and LOPE DE VEGA'S dramas; all the invention of CINTHIO and BOCCACCIO; all the characters of BALZAC; all the effective situations of HUGO, are as nothing compared with what the Corchiano records can furnish. There the imagination need not exert itself; plots will not be required; dramatic personages will be superfluous. Everything is ready at hand on the banks of the yellow Tiber; a little arrangement and manipulation, and presto! the work is done. Novels, romances, plays, poems, without number may be had for trifling investigation, and such as no carping critic can justly pronounce extravagant, unnatural, artificial, since they have been lived before they shall have been written.

There can no longer be any excuse for dramatists at home and abroad stealing wholesale from French authors, and calling it adaptation. Even the strangeness and the horrors of the causes célèbres are tame and tiresome in contrast with the fiery emotions, subtle plans, and desperate measures that the mediæval Italians have shared, formed, and taken. Their whole wayward, incongruous, thrilling life is set down in the invaluable collection, and the ambitious writers who go first will have the largest choice. There should be literary pilgrimages to Rome from every quarter of the civilized globe, to gather the glorious harvest which shall make every man of ink his own poet, and every playwright—marvelous to relate—the author of his own plays.

GOSSIP ABOUT GREAT PERSONAGES.

European newspapers are full of dreadful stories relating to the causes of the failure of the conference at Constantinople. Plain matter-of-fact people, who are dependent upon their knowledge of events as derived from daily dispatches, have imbibed views concerning the crisis in the East which have been very different from the real facts of the case, if one may trust the European gossips. The Governments represented at the conference were imperial, monarchical, aristocratic. To those of our fellow-citizens who have habitually regarded dukes, lords, and earls as a little lower than the angels, any gossip concerning these exalted personages would simply seem incredible. There is no unpleasant rumor concerning an American citizen—however eminent he may be—that is impossible of belief. But an English lord of high degree, for example, is naturally supposed to be so far removed above the ordinary passions of humanity that what he does and says, and what is said and done by those who appertain to him, has a certain Olympian weight and dignity which is unattainable in any republican form of government or society. This being true, it is a great shock to our reverence for aristocratic institutions to learn that the wits of the London and Paris press pursued with ridicule the Right Hon. ROBERT ARTHUR TALBOT GASCOIGNE-CECIL, Marquis of Salisbury, Secretary of State for India, when he went to Constantinople as Minister Plenipotentiary, to represent Great Britain in the conference there assembled.

Salisbury, Marquis and Secretary, as aforesaid, traveled in great state and with a suite which was large enough to set up a small European kingdom with a Cabinet and nobility. The stories told of his "style," as an American would say, are edifying. But, as if a nobleman whose ancestry dates back to the Norman conquest could not make dignified progress toward Constantinople without moving the mirth of the baser newspaper world, he was ridiculed from the first as an anachronism and an amateur diplomatist. What is worse, Lady Salisbury, who, unhappily, accompanied her lord on this delicate mission, was described as being a strong-minded marplot, a managing woman who despised Mahommedans and regarded the Turks as a sort of semi-savage pagans. In our own country, where the women are regarded with a certain quaint old-fashioned chivalry, and where the domestic relations of a public man are seldom invaded by even the most brutal of newspapers, such stories as those told of the blue-blooded Right Hon. ARTHUR TALBOT, &c., Marquis of Salisbury, and his noble wife seem simply shocking. When a famous lady's relations to Gen. JACKSON broke up his Cabinet and caused much scandal, high-bred and high-born critics in other countries thanked GOD that such things were impossible in an aristocratic government. And when a Russian Minister's wife and an American Cabinet officer's wife got together by the ears in Washington, and the gossips of that city gabbled about dissensions in the Cabinet sown by one or both of these dames, it was only natural that people who believed that a republic was only another name for vulgar disorder looked upon the scandal as a sign of our political weakness.

But here is a noble lady who is credited by English and Continental newspapers with having been the cause of the diplomatic failure at Constantinople. What is worse, she is said to have accomplished this result by the sheer force of indiscretion. It is not necessary that this should be true. The mere fact that it is reported at all ought to shock the fine sensibilities of those of our fellow-citizens who believe that only a titled aristocracy can rest serenely in the empyrean which is above criticism or scandal. Lady Salisbury is said to be a woman of positive character. She has an inquiring mind and a laudable desire to know the world. When she went to Constantinople with her noble spouse, she readily found her way into the harems of some of the dignitaries of the Sublime Porte. She had never before seen a woman who owned only a minute fraction of a husband, though she might have gazed upon this marital phenomenon by visiting Salt Lake City, Utah. With a virtuous Englishwoman's scorn, she expressed her opinion of such a state of society. She told the ladies of the harem just what she thought of such a system as that which held them in gilded bondage. Furthermore, being admitted to the private family of MIDHAT Pasha, who, poor man, has but two wives, she chatted with Mrs. MIDHAT No. 1, but, turning her back on No. 2, she said that she "did not choose to associate with concubines." That the roof of MIDHAT'S palace did not fall in and crush this daring critic of Mohammedan customs was owing, no doubt, to the fact that Turkish roofs have lately been compelled to hear a great deal of outspoken opinion concerning affairs.

It is not necessary to receive this tale as true, nor is it needful that we believe the additional statement that such performances as those related of Lady Salisbury shocked and disgusted the Turkish magnates, destroyed the influence of the noble Marquis, alienated Turkey from England, and finally broke up the conference. It is possible, even probable, that all this is idle gossip. It is likely, too, that the tales concerning Salisbury's alleged "crankiness" and inflated self-importance are equally untrue. The point which must attract the attention of any free-born American who would go out of his way to kick a Duke, is that public gossip concerning the private life and manners of statesmen and their wives is not necessarily a republican institution. It is very true that in the heat of a political contest American newspapers and stump speakers do use personalities which are disgraceful. By common consent, if not in common decency, men's family relations are let alone, and public opinion reserves its bitterest scorn for him who "would lay his hand upon a woman," even in the fierce heat of a contest for Justice of the Peace, Congressman, or fence-viewer. But after this kind of tattle, those of our fellow-citizens who, disgusted with the low personalities and license of the politics of a Republic, have looked across the ocean to envy the high-bred calm of English political life, must be disheartened. That the Marchioness of Salisbury should be the subject of ill-natured newspaper ridicule because the noble Marquis belongs to the Government party, is bad enough. But when we hear that a noble earl, who is also Premier, is suspected of encouraging these attacks, we may well despair of monarchical institutions.

THE FINE ARTS.

SALE OF OIL-PAINTINGS AND WATER-COLORS.

The art-rooms of Henry D. Miner, auctioneer, at No. 845 Broadway, near Thirteenth-street, will be open for a sale of water-colors and oil-paintings on the evenings of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday next. Dog-fanciers will find in No. 7 a very attractive little picture of a terrier, by De Vos, of Paris. The dog is examining a rat caught in a spring trap. Prof. Boehm, of Munich, has a copy of the celebrated portrait of the old Flemish master who holds his wife on his knee and raises with his right hand a glass of wine. Vaint, the young Italian painter who committed suicide at a picnic not far from this City, is represented by a Spring scene called "The Proposal." An old beau is bending over the hand of a damsel dressed in a somewhat peasant-like attire. Julian Scott has several small oils, representing United States soldiers with their muskets in various positions according to the manual of arms. E. L. Henry, also of New-York, has a "Return from the Drive," which has his usual characteristics of careful work in brilliant colors not too harmoniously blended. F. A. Bridgman, of Paris, is fully as bold in No. 21, "Hurrah! Hurrah!" but his colors are better managed. The bright green of the seawood, the brown of the old anchor, on which a tattered fisherboy stands; the bright surf and water fading up through the cliffs to a dark, cloudy sky, are all fresh and suggestive. George Inness, of New-York, is a painter of whom one can be pretty sure, though one should buy a picture blindfold. No. 58. "Sunset near New-York," has the finest of qualities. It is a picture to have in one's room and never to tire of. There is another example of Inness under No. 28, "The Mill in the Woods." Thomas Moran appears in two small pictures, which are termed "Gems" by the compiler of the catalogue. One might infer the same from the extraordinary care with which they are inclosed in little cameras with glass covers. They are good and fresh little pictures, but show no evidence of requiring such careful treatment. Samuel Colman, of New-York, has a very pleasant landscape under No. 49, "Summer Day at Salt Lake," with clouds gathered about the tops of distant mountains, and the foreground brown. He has another sketch of some merit under No. 82. Alexander Wust, who used to paint enormous canvases with mountain views, is remembered here very favorably under No. 71, "On the Coast of Norway." This is a better specimen than we have ever seen from his much regretted pencil. No. 48, "Out for Luck," has some fine qualities also. A trout fisherman has rambled down just such a glen as one sees debouching into the Hudson in the region of the Highlands. Coolness and seclusion are happily rendered. There are several pictures by David Johnson, and one or more of A. T. Bricher's hard, unfeeling marines. In No. 95, "Scene in the North Woods," we have a specimen of Homer D. Martin's work. The subject, from frequent treatment, may be said to be almost commonplace, yet Mr. Martin has given it individuality and what is very like a poetical quality. He does not seem to be afraid of colors, probably because he feels that he can handle them. This picture would make a good pendant to George Inness' "Sunset Near New-York."

To return to the foreigners. There will be found under Nos. 12 and 13 two little pictures by Bouchet, of Paris, which are remarkable for their tone, as the exclusion of whatever story they may have been intended to convey. We should judge that these possessed the lasting quality as far as regards the affections of their owner. There is also a very small Ziem that is well worth consideration. It is a little marine, a sunset, a ship under sail, &c. F. Hohbech, of Munich, shows conscientious work and no mean degree of skill in a quietly humorous picture of a German huntsman, who mocks at poor Renard, lying dead. T. Chaigneau, of Paris, has a picture in No. 55—"Sheep"—which will afford a most agreeable relief to those who are worn out with the washed, combed, curled, and presumably perfumed sheep of Verboeckhoven, some of the greatest monsters that modern painting has to show, and, like monsters generally, bringing a monstrous price. These sheep are real, healthy, every-day sheep, not the impossibilities of a child's fairy-tale. A couple of examples of Hildebrandt, of Berlin, are here for those who like his work, and two more by Carl Hoff, of Düsseldorf; one is the well-known card-playing scene where one young man is making eyes at a demure maid, while her neighbor, a hypocritical youth of powdered locks, squeezes her hand under cover of the table. There is also a grand array of water-colors, giving sketches from many lands, inclusive of the United States, and painted by Mr. John Faulkner, of the Royal Hibernian Academy. Under No. 207 there is a spirited and fine little water-color, to which is attached the name of John Constable, R. A., London.

FUNERAL OF REAR ADMIRAL ALDEN.

PORTLAND, Me., Feb. 24.—The funeral of the late Rear Admiral Alden took place this morning. Bishop Neely performed the services of the Episcopal Church in the Council Chamber, where the remains have laid in state, and from thence a large procession, comprising city officials, Army, and Navy officers, and a military escorte of 250 men, accompanied the body to the old cemetery, where it was laid near the grave of Commodore Preble.

REBUKING CHURCH BELLS.

A PHILADELPHIA COURT'S DECISION

AN INTERESTING DECISION IN PHILADELPHIA—RINGING THE BELLS OF ST. MARK'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH STOPPED BY THE COURTS—THE WAVES OF SOUND—LAW AND SCIENCE COMPOUNDED.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA, Saturday, Feb. 24, 1877.

A curious case was decided in Common Pleas Court, No. 2, in this city, to-day, by Judge Hare, who allowed an injunction to prevent the ringing of the chimes in the tower of St. Mark's P. E. Church. The particulars of this case were published in THE TIMES more than a month since, when the petition was first presented to the court. St. Mark's is the High Church here, and its attendants are among our wealthiest citizens. It is situated on Locust-street, near Seventeenth, in an aristocratic quarter, and the surroundings are in keeping with the church and the worshipers. Some time since a fund was made for a chime, and, so as to be in exact imitation of the chimes abroad, and of the Established Church of England, the bells were imported from that country. When they had arrived, they were set up in the steeple, and an unskilful hand called the faithful to service by their ringing. It was not musical, but loud and harsh, and soon proved a decided nuisance to the residents of the neighborhood. The ringing of the chimes at the hours set for ordinary service did not so much annoy the denizens of that locality as did the fact that in the early morning, about 5 o'clock, a monotonous clanging announced that early morning service would begin. This was the straw which broke the camel's back, and in their desperation the residents appealed to the vestry of St. Marks, who gave the petitioners to understand that the bells belonged to them, and they would do what they pleased with them. This roused the ire of the neighbors, and they carried the matter into court, employing the best counsel that could be procured.

Physicians were called by the plaintiffs to show the deleterious effects upon the residents of the ringing of the bells, but more especially their effect upon invalids. Even had the sounds been received through blue glass, which is another Philadelphia idiosyncrasy, it was not believed they would be less hurtful. After long and weighty arguments the Judges took the matter into consideration, and to-day the decision was announced, which prevents the future ringing of the chimes, at least under the present disagreeable method. The opinion of the court, after stating the salient points of the contention, says that the question to be determined was one more of fact than law, namely, whether upon the evidence submitted the ringing of the chimes was proved to be a cause of pain, discomfort, and ill-health to the denizens of the locality. From the evidence the court was convinced that the complainants had established their case, that the chimings of the bells were disagreeable and intolerable.

The full text of the opinion is decidedly interesting, and contains the following, after stating the causes which impelled the complainants to bring the suit:

The chiming of bells date from a remote period in the Christian Church; they have been received with general favor and acceptance, and it would be difficult to find any great poet, from Dante down to our own times, by whose verse does not bear witness to this truth. The sounds so much complained of are not a mere accidental accompaniment, but have from association become an integral part of the celebration of the Sunday, which brings an opportunity for rest to all; and the court should be slow to believe that a custom hallowed by the observance and sanctioned by the assent of successive generations of worshipers can be injurious, and that, in fact, in the present case, as will be apparent on examining the testimony, if some persons inveigh against the bells which give occasion for this suit, other and not less numerous voices are raised in their behalf. The court, therefore, cannot infer that, if the sufferings for which the bill seeks relief are not imaginary, they are the inevitable offspring or accompaniment of nervous disease, although a morbid or excited fancy attributes them to the peals issuing from the tower of defendant's church. It results from what has been said, that the case may conveniently be considered under two heads: First, is the injury complained of real, and do the complainants suffer from the cause alleged? second, if the answer to this inquiry is in favor of the bill, are the defendants entitled to continue the ringing, notwithstanding the suffering which it may produce? The laws of sound are uniform, but their operation is controlled by causes that cannot always be readily ascertained. A recent paper by Mr. Tyndall gives some remarkable instances of this phenomenon, and I believe that the most expert men of science would hesitate to declare beforehand in what spot echo would best or oftenest reflect the voice. One circumstance is apparent in this case, even to an unscientific eye, that the houses in Locust-street, rising as they do nearly to the level of the belfry, are exposed to the full force of the waves of sound which pour forth from its windows, and which pass over the humbler roofs in Erety-street, although, only according to the affidavits of Thomas and Mary Dantry, do break resonantly on the dwelling which they occupy further on in Chancellor-street. The truth is that a casual or uninstructed observer can no more predict or account for the seemingly wayward course of the vibrations which constitute sound, than he can tell where the undertow renders it dangerous to venture into the surf, or than the mariner can anticipate which of the coming seas will rise above the rest and break on board his vessel.

The conclusion to which we are brought by a review of the testimony is that from the level at which the bells of St. Mark's are hung, and from their proximity to the surrounding buildings—and it may be from other circumstances which are not accurately known or determined—they cannot be chimed or rung without causing an annoyance to the dwellers in the neighborhood, which, in the case of some of them who stand most in need of care, amounts to a serious injury, and should consequently be abated by an injunction. Whether the prohibition shall be absolute will depend on circumstances. It is no part of our design to impose any restraint on the defendants that is not essential to protect the complainants, and if a mode of chiming can be devised that will not be attended with injurious consequences, we shall be glad to sanction it by a decree. We, moreover, earnestly desire not to hinder such moderate tolling or ringing on Sunday, before morning and evening service, as may be satisfactory to both parties, and trust that counsel will come to some arrangement by which this will be accomplished.

Erety and Chancellor streets, spoken of, are small thoroughfares in the rear of the church, and the dwellings are of the conventional Philadelphia two-story style. It is probable that the matter will be amicably arranged, and the chimes allowed to ring by the coming Sabbath.

OBITUARY.

GEN. ANDREW W. DENISON.

Gen. Andrew W. Denison, Postmaster in Baltimore for nearly eight years, was found dead in his bed yesterday morning. It is supposed that he died from apoplexy, as he retired at 11 o'clock the night before in his usually excellent health. The deceased was a gallant and brave officer during the late war, having entered the Union service in August, 1862, as Colonel of the Eighth Maryland Volunteer Infantry, which he had raised and served till the close of the war. He was engaged in a number of battles, having lost an arm at the battle of Laurel Hill, Spottsylvania County, Va., where he was in command of the Maryland brigade attached to the Second Division (Gen. Robinson) of the Fifth Army Corps, under Gen. Warren. He was again wounded in the battle of White Oak Ridge, near Petersburg, March 31, 1865. For gallantry in the first-named battle he was breveted Brigadier General, and in the battle of White Oak Ridge, Major General. The deceased was in his 46th year.

THE LATE HENRY SOUTHMAYD.

The late Henry Southmayd, who died Friday at his home, corner of Grand and Warren streets, Jersey City, was a well-known railroad official. He was born in Middletown, Conn., in the year 1815, and nearly fifty years ago removed with his parents to Jersey City and started out as a clerk in a wholesale grocery store. He afterward found a place in the offices of the New-Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, his father being at that time the General Superintendent of the road. Mr. Southmayd succeeded John Worthington, as Secretary of the company, and for over 30 years discharged the duties of that position with great satisfaction to the stockholders. In 1873, when the New-Jersey Transportation Company was leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, ill-health compelled him to resign. He was soon afterward stricken with paralysis, and had frequent attacks since. His disease baffled all the skill of his physicians, and Friday evening he breathed his last. His symptoms were so peculiar that his family at first entertained the idea of holding a post-mortem examination of the body, but it was afterward abandoned. A funeral service will be held at his late residence to-morrow evening, and Tuesday morning the remains will be taken to Green-Wood Cemetery for interment.

THE DEAD CUBAN GENERAL.

The remains of Major Gen. Aguilera, ex-President of the insurrectionary Government of Cuba, will be placed in the Governor's Room in the City Hall at 10 o'clock this morning, at which time his friends and acquaintances will be given an opportunity to see them. The hall has been appropriately draped in mourning, and the national, State, Municipal, and Cuban flags will be displayed at half-mast in honor of the occasion. To-morrow at 9 o'clock the body will be removed to the Roman Catholic Church of St. Francis de Xavier, where the funeral ceremonies will be performed.

THE LAST REVOLUTION BEING SUPPRESSED, PEACE REIGNS UNTIL FURTHER ORDERS—THE DARIEN SURVEYING EXPEDITION—DEATH OF MR W. A. BROOKS.

PANAMA, Feb. 16.—The following is a copy of a telegram transcribed to the State Government by the Municipal Chief of Buenaventura:

TELEGRAPH OFFICE, CALI, Jan. 27, 1877.

To the Municipal Chief of Buenaventura:

I received the following telegram last night:

CARTAGO, Jan. 26.

Citizen President of the State, Cali:

It is 9 o'clock A. M., and I have just received the following official telegram:

SAN JUAN, 25th.

Señor Eliseo Payan:

I have just learned from official sources that at Sabanetas, near Soata, State of Santander, the Guasca and Balderama guerillas combined were defeated by Gen. Wilches. The losses were 400 killed, 300 wounded, and 300 prisoners. The States of Santander, Boyaca, and Cundinamarca are thus left free, and 5,000 men disengaged to invade Antioquia. Please advise.

DR. CONTO JUAN MARTINEZ.

Which intelligence I forward you in compliance with Senor Martinez' request, that it may be published throughout the State. ELISEO PAYAN.

The foregoing is authentic. R. ZAVADSKY.

Gen. Guardia had returned to Costa Rica from Guatemala and Salvador, entirely unsuccessful in his efforts to get up a war with Nicaragua.

All the Central American States are at peace. The coffee crop is now coming forward in large quantities.

The rumor of the death of Mr. W. A. Brooks, of the Darien Surveying Expedition, has been confirmed. The sad event occurred at the Indian Village of Paya, upon the head-waters of the Tuyra River, Jan. 26.

There has been no definite information received to date from the expedition. If there had been any great success it is probable it would have been made known.

The Isthmus is quiet and the weather is splendid. The men-of-war Pensacola, Omaha, and Albatross are in port.

The Panama Government has succeeded in raising a forced loan.

THE NEW-HAMPSHIRE ELECTION.

CHEERING REPORTS FROM REPUBLICAN SOURCES—ACTIVITY OF THE DEMOCRATS IN THE CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS.

The Concord, N. H., correspondent of the Boston Journal writes, under date of Feb. 23: "The Executive Board of the Republican State Committee are in session in Concord this evening. They bring cheering reports for the Republicans from all important sections of the State, and say that with proper exertions Mr. Prescott can be elected Governor by 5,000 majority, and every Congressional district be carried for the same party." But this correspondent in the same letter goes on to say:

"We have reliable information from numerous sources all tending to show that the Democrats are not indifferent or inactive in the present campaign. Their line of policy is not in all respects the same as last year, and it is highly important that the Republicans get as fully informed as possible as to the tactics of the enemy. At the last State election the Democrats had some hope of electing a Governor, but this year they have none. They are convinced that Marcy, with his bad war record and fossil ideas generally, will lose votes among some of the young Democrats, and they are not going to waste ammunition in his behalf. But in the Congressional elections the Democrats are resolved to put out their whole strength, almost regardless of the remainder of the State ticket. They are using money freely in the First and Third Congressional Districts, and are endeavoring to trade Governor for Congress votes in the Second District. Marcy and Frank Jones have joined hands in the hope of re-electing the latter to Congress. Marcy gives $10,000 for campaign purposes, but with the understanding that at least one-half of it shall be expended in the First District. It may seem strange that Marcy should be willing to put out money when he has no prospects for an election, but he is sensitive concerning the criticisms that the young Democrats have made concerning his popularity, and he wants to secure as flattering a vote as possible. There is also another cause for Marcy's furnishing the sinews of war, which is, that last year he received maternal aid in the campaign from Jones, with the understanding that he should reciprocate in this canvass. Jones is arranging to put out large sums of money in the close towns of his district, and although very wealthy himself, he will have additional aid from the Democratic lobby at Washington. In the Third District, which includes the entire western and northern portions of the State, the Democrats are using money and every other influence they can command. The closeness of the district causes the enemy to be unusually earnest and active.

In the Second District, which includes the counties of Merrimack and Hillsborough, and hence the cities of Concord, Nashua, and Manchester, the Democrats are endeavoring to trade off Gubernatorial for Congressional votes, and use the cunning argument that it will swell Prescott's support and not hazard the election of the Republican nominees for Congress. Republicans should be on their guard against any such bargaining, for although our majority in this district was 1,470 at the recent Presidential election, yet for many years the Congressional contests have been generally close. Sullowway, of Franklin, the Democratic candidate, although personally a good citizen, is adroit and unscrupulous in his political manœuvres, and needs watching all the time. He is rich, and it he chooses can put $25,000 into the campaign, and have additional funds from his connections in this State and in Massachusetts."

REPORTED LOSS OF THE BARK FRANKLIN.

Private information received in this City yesterday reports that a name board, painted white and marked, in blue cut letters, "Franklin," was washed ashore at Terschelling, an island in the North Sea, on the 24 inst., together with calks of cedar, oak, and other planks, barrels of lard, sacks of flour, apples, bacon, &c., all probably being from some vessel wrecked in the vicinity of the island. The wrecked stuff is believed to be from the bark Franklin, (German,) Capt. Petersen, from this City, Jan. 3, for Hamburg, and spoken off Dungeness Jan. 29. All on board are believed to be lost. Her cargo consisted of 7,984 bags of rye, 2,000 boxes of starch, 200 boxes of bacon, 200 tierces of lard, 18 cases of spokes and hubs, 17,646 feet of lumber, 244 logs, 80 logs walnut, 1,000 packages of flour, 137 barrels of apples, and 575 barrels of syrup.

SUPPRESSED BY THE POLICE.

Capt. Byrnes, of the Fifteenth Precinct, accompanied by Detectives Slevin and Dolan and a platoon of his command, made a raid last night on the "free and easy" kept by the notorious Paddy Duffy, at No. 175 Greene-street, and arrested the proprietor and some fifty men and women who were found carousing in the place. The "free and easy" was formerly kept by Phil. Brady, and has been the resort of disorderly characters of both sexes, and a rendezvous for the most desperate thieves in the City. The place was raided on four or five months ago, and Brady, who was then the proprietor, was tried in the Court of Special Sessions for keeping a disorderly house. He was convicted and fined $50. The place then passed into the hands of Paddy Duffy, who was discharged from Sing Sing Prison about six months ago, having served there nearly nine years for stabbing Patrolman Dyckman, of the Eighth Precinct, while the officer was endeavoring to arrest him for disorderly conduct. Among the prisoners arrested in the place last night was Phil. Brady, the former proprietor. The prisoners will be arraigned at the Washington Place Police Court this morning. Capt. Byrnes also made a descent last night on the faro bank No. 856 Broadway, of which John Pentland is the reputed proprietor. Pentland, and Patrick Donovan, one of the players, were the only persons arrested. The Police seized one of the most expensive sets of gaming implements that has ever been captured.

PARLIAMENT AND THE CONDITION OF POLITICS.

THE DIFFICULTY OF KEEPING DEPUTIES IN ROME—HOW THE MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR WAS REWARDED BY THE KING—TITLES THROWN ABOUT PROMISCUOUSLY—THE WHIRL OF THE CARNIVAL.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ROME, Wednesday, Feb. 7, 1877.

Parliament is falling back into its old habit of drag and dawdle, and its laziness is criticised nearly as much by the organs of the majority actually ruling, as by the newspapers of the party of the Opposition. Only about half the members are in their seats, and with all the scolding it is hard to get more than half the Deputies to come to Rome. Unless a question is under discussion which puts more than usual strain upon the Government, the benches of the House are not at all well filled. Some signs of varying opinion have been shown by those who are depended upon to support the Ministry, but not yet anything like what may be taken as a tendency to split. Fretful critics and factionists, who wish to see everything go upon the gallop, are not satisfied, because certain measures of radical change or so-called reform are not at once voted. But by the more prudent leaders, festina lente is believed to be the safest maxim, and by it their action is still guided. Signor Nicotera, the Minister of the Interior, has been pricked, stung, and shot at, and subjected to partisan annoyances, which have severely tried his temper; but he has kept his head above water, or carried it high in the air, and has maintained himself resolutely in his official place. His title of Baron has been called in question, a ground of attack all the more strange since titles are given and received, or flung about in such a very loose manner, as to take away from them most of their value. But the King has come to the relief of his Minister, and with sovereign will and mere motion has conferred upon Nicotera the title of Duke of Sapri. Such a thick coat of salve is suited to allay the smart of any wounds lately made, although it has not stopped the laugh and talk of the public and of the press, or of the less friendly portion of the organs of passion, opinion, and caprice.

It has always been well known that titles in Italy are as plenty as blackberries, but within a few years the King has been active in paying off small debts due to friends by multiplying titles and making new "nobles." Bits of ribbon have fallen in showers from the windows of the Quirinal Palace, as they did before from those of the Pitti, to be hung about the necks of those ever after to be known as counts, cavaliers, and commendatori. Such titles as duke, marquis, or count, whether bought with money, or received in pay for services rendered to the crown, have a certain value in social circles and in the matrimonial market. Not a few ladies, whether natives of the country or English, American, or other foreigners, have an ambition to be addressed by their friends and servants with the euphonious ornament of a noble prefix to their names, and not a few have already had their aspirations gratified. Others are on the look-out; but there are few content to take in pay for their charms, whether of fortune or person, any smaller coin than baron, marquis, or count. I have a Roman friend, of the best family connections, and with personal qualities not in any way to be found fault with, either on the score of manners, morals, accomplishments, or physical graces, who is all forlorn because he is without a title, and frankly declares that his hopes of winning an American lady toward whom his sighs are breathed are vain, because he is not able to offer, with all the rest, this crowning charm. I know also a lady who is disappointed because she is not yet in possession of all she bargained for—as the King has only made her husband Senator; and, flexible as the Italian language is, that extremely proper noun cannot by any ingenuity be twisted into the feminine. The Pope, when he was in the exercise of his prerogatives as a royal functionary, was one of the most obliging of sovereigns in the honorable rewards of this sort which he bestowed upon his friends. We have many proofs of this generosity among those still living and walking about in Rome. If the "noble" only has added to his other virtues that of wealth, one does not see but that the bran new title sits as gracefully upon him, so far as respect in society is concerned, as the titles of others which may have come down by succession through a thousand years. To finish with the subject, it may be mentioned that the King has lately made Gen. Medici, at present his first Aide de Camp, Marquis of Vascello, and Gen. Cialdini, Italian Minister to France, has been similarly duked Duke of Gaeta, while Signor Visconti-Venosta, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has become Marquis of Laurion. This is the kind of bait thrown to big fish, but hundreds of the smaller fry are caught with what can be held on a pin-hook.

Returning to Parliament and the condition of parties, the opinion is expressed that before long there must be a readjustment to succeed the dissolving process now begun. A majority so large must not be allowed to undervalue or abuse its privileges. Considerable latitude of action is left to the party, or at least not a few individual members are disposed to indulge such liberty as we saw a little while ago in the vote upon the clerical question. Severe discipline in so large a body is not easy. To bigot Sella, an experienced and able party leader and tactician, is attributed the purpose of leading off some of the forces of the majority by measures of accommodation. He is in favor of independence of opinion and action of individuals of all parties upon questions of minor concern, and submission to discipline only in what touches the supreme interests of the nation.

We are in the whirl of carnival, and until another week is past the dizzy dance will not end. The newspapers of the class devoted to more serious discussions criticise the habit of giving so much time to holidays and amusements, and cite the examples of the countries of the northern races to prove that more work and less play contribute to provident habits and national prosperity. The simple truth is, that the people of these countries have too many holidays and those of northern nations not enough. If we include Sundays—which here are in some sort days of recreation—and the festas of the principal Saints, with the week or two of carnival, we find that the Italians, with nearly all the others of the Catholic or Latin stock, have 80 days, or more than a fifth of all the days in the year for relaxation from toil. The American works twice as hard and accomplishes a much larger result than the Italian; but it is at the cost of an excessive wear and tear of muscle. How often we see here our countrymen wandering about seeking rest which they could not find, or their friends would not allow them to indulge or enjoy, at home. Some of them, not yet past 40, wear faces with all the oil of gladness and freshness of youth gone; the skin sallow, parched, and wrinkled, justifying the remark sometimes heard here, that Americans are going back to or assuming the aboriginal Indian type.

As for carnival, every year it is losing its animation. To keep it up involves considerable outlay, and individuals and society organizations do not feel disposed, or able to bear the burden of cost, now that the municipality contributes so much less than it voted for public diversion in former years. Those who have anything to spend are more disposed to lay it out on the masked balls of the theatres, than in the Bacchanalian riots of the Corso. A poor market is made this season for the windows and balconies of this street, to which the wild hilarity is principally confined. The scarcity of foreign visitors, who were formerly in the habit of throwing away a great deal of money upon carnival toggery, makes all the difference in the world, to a number of branches of small commerce dependent upon this festival. A change is needed, and it in making a reform, a refinement could be given to the carnival of Rome, such as this divertisement once had at Florence, it may not wholly die out, but may be turned to better account.

END OF A NEW-JERSEY WANDERER.

Mayor Ely received a communication yesterday from the Mayor of Hastings, Neb., stating that one Charles Lockhart recently died in that town, having walked 400 miles on foot from the Black Hills, where he had gone on the expedition four years ago. He died of apoplexy. Lockhart lived in Newark, N. J., in 1870, and his relatives are supposed to reside there now. In order to have the remains identified the letter contains the following description of the deceased: He is 28 years old, 5 feet 10 inches in height, light complexion. On his right arm, in Indian ink, are the words, "In memory of my mother."

INSURANCE MEN WANTED.

BENJAMIN NOYES AND J. H. STEDWELL NOT TO BE FOUND—A MOVEMENT TO QUASH THE CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THEM.

ROME, Wednesday, Feb. 7, 1877.

Notwithstanding the fact that a meeting was arranged to have taken place in the early part of last week between Benjamin Noyes, the President of the National Capital Life Insurance Company, of Washington, D. C., and ex-Gov. Parker, the Receiver of the New-Jersey Mutual, looking to the transfer of the assets of the latter corporation, no further negotiations have, so far as can be learned, taken place. Inquiries are every day made regarding the whereabouts of Noyes and Jeremiah H. Stedwell, the President of the New-Jersey Mutual, but no one seems to know anything about them. In the suit instituted against the New-Jersey Mutual by Receiver Grace, of the Continental, counsel have not been able as yet to effect a service of the papers on Stedwell, and the writ of ne exeat issued by Judge Pratt, in Brooklyn, against Benjamin Noyes to prevent his leaving this State also remains unsatisfied. It has been denied that Noyes is endeavoring to elude the officers, but it is a somewhat curious fact that, upon learning he was wanted he, conceived a sudden desire to leave this City, and has not been seen here since, except, perhaps, by trusted friends. Mr. Henry D. Walker, the Treasurer of the National Capitol, yesterday stated that he did not know where Mr. Noyes was, but supposed that he might be found in Trenton. Stedwell, who is also wanted in New-Jersey, on a warrant charging him with conspiracy to defraud the policy-holders of the New-Jersey Mutual, is said to be in Philadelphia, but it is confidently believed that he is within a few miles of this City. Daniel J. Noyes, who was associated with the compromising legal adviser, is also made a party in the criminal proceedings that have been instituted by Secretary of State Henry C. Kelsey, and the warrant alleged to have been issued for his arrest has not yet been executed. Mr. J. H. Brinckerhoff, the Secretary of the New-Jersey Mutual, on Friday night, arrested by Chief of Police Mills, of Newark, on a warrant charging him with perjury, in having sworn falsely to the last annual statement of the company made on Dec. 31, 1875. He was taken into custody at his residence, No. 269 High street, Newark, but found security for his appearance in court yesterday, when he gave bail in $5,000 to answer such charges as the Grand Jury may deem fit to find against him. His sureties were Col. William Allen and Mr. C. C. Lathrop. Mr. Brinckerhoff alleges that he signed the report referred to while on a bed of sickness, when he had no opportunity to examine its correctness, and only after it had received the signature of the President.

It is understood that an effort is being made to quash the proceedings against Stedwell and Noyes before the Grand Jury meets in April, or before the Attorney General can file an information against them; but if such is the case Secretary of State Kelsey has not been apprised of it, and it is not likely that the movement will be successful. So far as could be learned last night only preliminary steps have been taken in the matter, and it is not known on what ground the parties intend to base their application.

REV. MR. WISWALL'S CHARACTER.

THE CHARGES AGAINST THE MASTER OF ST. JOHN'S GUILD TO BE INVESTIGATED.

A meeting was held last evening at the rooms of St. John's Guild, pursuant to the following notice:

NEW-YORK, Feb. 23, 1877.

DEAR SIR: In view of the libelous articles in to-day's issue of the New-York World, which tend to jeopardize the work of St. John's Guild, and injure the reputation of its Master, I have been requested by Rev. Mr. Wiswall, with the approval of Mr. Witney, the Warden, to call a meeting for conference of the members of the Board of Trustees of the Floating Hospital, the Board of Trustees of the Relief Fund, and the Board of Trustees of the Expense and Building Fund, at the rooms of St. John's Guild, No. 42 East Fourteenth street, on Saturday evening, Feb. 24, at 8 o'clock.

FRANK J. DUPIGNAC,
Secretary of the Board of Trustees of the Relief Fund.

Resolutions were unanimously adopted that Hon. Charles P. Daly, Messrs. W. H. Guion, H. K. Thurber, E. A. Quintard, and H. P. Baker be selected as Referees, to hear and report to the Board of Trustees the evidence which shall be taken for and against the management of St. John's Guild, or against its Master; that such examination be held at the rooms of St. John's Guild, No. 42 East Fourteenth-street, at such times as a majority of the Referees shall direct, and that such meetings shall be open to the public; that the State Board of Charities be requested to attend and make such inquiries as may be deemed pertinent to this examination; that any persons able to substantiate charges against the management of the Guild, or against its Master, be requested to appear and prefer charges, represented by counsel, if they so desire; that Mrs. Wiswall be permitted to appear as a witness, or produce any witnesses she may desire, and that all proper means shall be provided her for such purpose; and that the daily papers shall be notified when such examinations shall be held. Addresses denunciatory of the World's article were made by Col. F. A. Conkling, B. P. Baker, and others. The following Trustees were present at the meeting: William H. Wiley, Towsend Cox, David Phillips, M. D., John D. Townsend, F. J. Dupignac, B. P. Baker, J. M. Read, Albert A. Lamb, William L. Pomeroy, Homer Lee, Charles Spear, A. K. Bolsm, Louis V. Sone, F. A. Conkling, William H. Harrison, John P. Faure, H. M. Weed, S. K. Lansing, H. Shaler, William H. Guion, Jr., D. S. Watts.

A PROTEST AGAINST THE PILOTAGE FEES.

The shipping merchants and brokers of this City have forwarded to Albany a petition for the passage of Assembly Bill No. 62, which calls for a reduction of one-third of the present pilotage rates. It is claimed that during the period of high prices during the war, the merchants consented to an advance of 50 per cent., and that no reduction has since taken place. It is also asserted that pilots make more money on less capital than any other class of men. Each boat costs on an average when fully equipped about $7,500, and its earnings amount to about $22,000 per year. The expenses average about $5,000, leaving a profit of $17,000 per year to each boat. One-fourth of this amount, or $4,250, goes to the owners, leaving $12,750 to be divided among the six pilots who belong to the boat, or over $2,000 apiece, which is said to be greatly out of proportion to the work performed. Besides, many of the pilots are owners of shares in the boats and in several of them. Another point is that in many cases the services of a pilot are not needed, and that it is unjust to force vessels to hire them under those circumstances. It is urged that a less number of boats and men be employed, and that the boats have a fixed station between Fire Island and Barnegat, a distance of about 45 miles, so as to do away with the frequent imposition of off shore pilotage.

PURIM MASKED BALL.

The festival of Purim falls this year on Tuesday next, and the occasion will be celebrated by a grand fancy masked ball at Delmonico's, on Thursday evening, March 1, under the auspices of the Purim Association. The gentlemen composing the association have taken pains to make the affair as select and enjoyable as all their previous entertainments, and the great majority of our leading Hebrew citizens have signified their intention of being present. Ladies only will dress in fancy costumes, gentlemen appearing in ordinary evening costume. The arrangements are now complete, and judging from the character of former Purim entertainments, the affair cannot fail to be enjoyable. The number of tickets is necessarily limited to the accommodation of the rooms. A subscriber's ticket entitles the purchaser to supper and all other extras.

POISON IN A MURDERER'S STOMACH.

The chemical analysis of the stomach of Thomas Ryan, the Newark murderer, whose sudden death a few hours before the time set for his execution has provoked so much comment, was completed yesterday by Prof. Cornwall, of Princeton College. Several tests revealed the presence of arsenic, and it is also discernible by the use of the microscope. It is stated that traces of enough of the poison to kill six men of his build and constitution was found. It is hoped that the investigations of Coroner Osborne will show in what manner and by whom the poison was administered—whether by himself or his friends, and whether it was prepared in his victuals or not. The full result of the analysis will be announced at the inquest, which is to be resumed in Newark to-morrow afternoon.

GRAND AMATEUR ATHLETIC MEETING.

A grand amateur athletic meeting will come off on Thursday evening, March 1, at the Metropolitan Riding Academy, Third-avenue, Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth streets. There are 150 entries, representing all the prominent clubs in the country. There are 16 entries for the one-mile walk, 20 for the three-mile walk, 9 for the running high jump, 11 for the running broad jump, 10 for putting the shot, 22 for the 75-yard run, 27 for the quarter-mile run, 11 for the half-mile run, 13 for the one-mile run, and 5 for the 120-yard hurdle race.

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

GENERAL MENTION.

Mr. George Wood has become the lessee of the Lyceum Theatre.

"Our Boarding-House" continues to attract overflowing audiences to the Park Theatre.

Mr. Heller announces the nightly repetition of his third programme until further notice.

Nightly performances of "Fifth-Avenue" occur throughout this week at Booth's Theatre.

It is now understood that the Kiralfy Brothers will produce "A Trip to the Moon" at Booth's Theatre.

"The Danicheffs" will to-morrow enter upon the fourth week of the run of the drama at the Union-square Theatre.

The dory Centennial, the smallest boat that ever crossed the Atlantic, is now on exhibition at the New-York Aquarium.

"Our Hash House" is referred to as part of this week's nightly programme at the San Francisco Minstrels' Opera-house.

"The Two Orphans" is still the current attraction at the Grand Opera-house. A concert by the Louisiana Jubilee Singers occurs there to-night.

"Inshavogue; or Times in '98," is to be acted, with Mr. John T. Hinds in the principal rôle, at the New Broadway Theatre throughout the week.

"Around the World in Eighty Days" will be represented at Niblo's, throughout this week. The spectacle has of late undergone the improving process known in theatrical parlance as reconstruction.

An opera bouffe new to local audiences, and entitled "La Boulangère a des Ecus," will be made known at the Eagle Theatre to-morrow evening. Mlle. Aimée will, of course, personate the principal character.

Gilmore's Garden will be open to the public on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday evenings. Tuesday afternoon a special entertainment of races and out-door sports will be given there for the benefit of Mr. John Christian.

The last representations of "Lemons" are announced at the Fifth-Avenue Theatre. A new "comic sensation" will follow. On Saturday week Mr. Coghlan is to have a benefit performance, when he will appear in "Hamlet."

M. Durand, who has long been connected with local theatrical enterprises, has secured Darling's Opera-house, in Twenty-third-street, for a twelvemonth, commencing in October next, with the intention of giving there three representations of French plays weekly during the Fall and Winter.

"She Stoops to Conquer" will be revived tomorrow evening at Wallack's Theatre, with a distribution of rôles which will bring before the public Mr. Lester Wallack, Mr. Gilbert, Mr. Beckett, Mr. Stevenson, Miss Dyas, Miss Rose Wood, and Mme. Ponisi.

Miss Emma Abbott will repeat her performance of Maria in "La Figlia del Reggimento," at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon next. Yesterday's matinée representation of the opera was enjoyed, in spite of the rain, by an exceedingly numerous audience.

Mr. Richard Della Rosa Coker, one of the coming baritones, who has been recently on a visit to his parents in Brooklyn, has returned to Paris, where he intends finishing his histrionic studies under the great Régnier, of the Théâtre Français. Mr. Coker will proceed to Italy in the Autumn, and there make his début, of which very high expectations are formed by his friends and tutors.

Miss Emma Cranch has been added to the long list of artists—headed, of course, by Mme. Pappenheim, a prima donna from whom, with proper surroundings, great things can be expected—who are to take part in the Wagner Festival. New scenery is now being painted for "Die Walküre," and new costumes will be admired, we learn, in all the operas intended for representation.

Mr. Ole Bull and Mme. Essipoff will unite in two concerts to occur at Steinway Hall on Wednesday evening and on Saturday afternoon of this week. In yesterday's concert, Mme. Essipoff played Saint-Saens' grand concerto, opus 22, in G minor, with accompaniment of a second piano, Mr. Dulcken being the accompanist. The concerto, which is divided into three movements, is a remarkably elaborate and scholarly work, the scherzo being particularly tuneful and effective.

"Les Dragons de Villars," a three-act opera comique of a rather serious cast, was represented by Mlle. Aimée, M. Raoult, and the opera bouffe troupe of which these artists are the principal members, at the Academy of Music, last evening. The performance was given for the benefit of the Société Française de Bienfaisance. "Les Dragons de Villars" was sung at the Fifth-Avenue Theatre by Mlle. Irma and M. Aujac some years ago. The score contains several pretty airs and choruses, and an exceedingly dramatic finale occurring at the close of the second act. Mlle. Aimée, as Rose Friquet, rendered the numbers allotted to her with a pathetic charm quite equal in its potency to that of her merrier efforts in opera bouffe, and the audience, which included the Russian Grand Dukes, broke out in applause after each of her arias. M. Raoult, as Sylvain, interpreted his music with sentiment and taste, and, in other respects, the representation passed off pretty smoothly.

FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Mr. John Parry's benefit realized about £1,300.

Mlle. Albani has appeared in "Linda" at the Paris Italiens.

Miss Genevieve Ward is about to act Lady Macbeth in French in Paris.

Alfred De Vigny's "Chatterton" has been revived at the Théâtre Français.

M. Lecocq's new opera called "La Marjolaine" has been exceedingly successful at the Renaissance Theatre.

Mr. Gilbert's "On Bail," just now produced at the Criterion Theatre, in London, proves to be another adaptation of "Le Réveillon."

A "Cossack drama," in verse, called "L'Hetman," and written by M. Paul Deroulède, has been successfully produced at the Paris Odeon Theatre.

The all health of M. Sardou prevents him from completing his drama of "Les Exiles," two acts of which have been received at the Porte Saint-Martin.

The repetitions of Gounod's "Cinq Mars" at the Paris Opera Comique are being urged forward rapidly, and the first performance is expected to take place about the end of the month.

M. Emile Perrin, who for six weeks was prevented by a serious indisposition from attending to his functions at the Théâtre Français, is now quite restored to health, and was present at the final rehearsals of "Chatterton."

Among the most attentive of the auditors at the performance of "King Richard III." at the London Lyceum Theatre, on the first night, was the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. She owns a box in the theatre, and is a frequent attendant at the Shakespearean plays there.

A SECURE AND ELEGANT TREASURE-KEEP

From the San Francisco Chronicle.

The latest notable addition to the interior fittings of the Baldwin Hotel, which are on a scale of magnificence surpassing any other public house in the United States, is an office safe from the manufactory of Herring & Co., New-York. It is the perfection of strength to resist the encroachments of fire, and embodies the most effective systems of ingenious devices to baffle the invasion of unlawful hands. This model stronghold is of a new class of safes lately introduced by Herring & Co., styled the New Patent Champion, and combines in its construction several important improvements. It stands about ten feet high, and is surmounted with a pediment ornamented with a fine painting of the hotel. The panels are elegantly painted with characters representing the "Seasons," and the exterior is otherwise ornate with rich gildings. The ponderous double doors, secured by one of the latest improved combination locks, open upon two inner doors correspondingly heavy and invincible in their fastenings, except to the person in possession of the "open sesame"—the mystic numbers—to whom the ponderous jaws divide as if controlled by a magic spell. The interior is then exposed in part, two-thirds of the space being fitted up with shelves and racks for books. The lower portion of the safe is divided into two burglar-proof treasure boxes, each secured by a combination lock.

BREAKING IN THE CHURCH DOORS.

REOPENING OF ST. JAMES', NEAR LONDON —THE DEMAND OF THE BISHOP ON THE CHURCH-WARDENS DISREGARDED—THE DOORS BROKEN IN AND SERVICES HELD BY THE NEW RECTOR.

From the London News, Feb. 12.

The Church of St. James, Hatcham, was reopened yesterday for public worship. On Friday the keys were, it was stated, demanded of the Vicar, Rev. A. Tooth, and of each of the church-wardens, but not delivered up. On Saturday afternoon, about 4:45 o'clock, Mr. A. J. Day, the Secretary of the Bishop of the Diocese, went to the north door in company with a locksmith, and in the presence of Inspector Relfe and a few policemen, acting under his orders, the smith succeeded in getting into the church, not by the ordinary process of picking the lock, which, it was found, would not yield to such efforts, but by using such an amount of violence as was necessary to effect an entrance. Mr. Plimpton, one of the church-wardens, who resides close to the church, having come upon the scene during the process of opening, demanded to be informed on what authority such a step was taken; but he was met by a declaration from Inspector Relfe that he was there by orders and would not allow any interference. Immediately after the church was opened Rev. Benjamin Dale, who had been licensed by the Bishop as temporary Curate, entered and took possession, there being only a very few persons besides the Bishop's Secretary as witnesses. It was then discovered that nearly all the distinctive decorations in and outside the chancel had been previously removed. The gate of the chancel had, like the door of the church, to be forced. The altar had, of course, very much the appearance compared with that which it had presented when last seen by the Hatcham public. The six tall candles, the floral decorations, &c., had disappeared, and so also had the little figures of angels, which had formed such a conspicuous artistic feature. The lofty rood screen—a handsome oak paneled structure having allegorical paintings in front—remained, surmounted with a large wooden cross, and, stretching all across the middle of the aisle near the little pulpit, there was still a solid beam bearing a large calvary. There were no longer any banners to be seen; but on the pillar behind the pulpit there was left a tasteful ornamental cross. In the baptistry—a handsome circular place, having a dome above—the confessional occupied its old position, there being a seat in the middle for the clergyman and a wire opening on each side for penitents. The entrance to the organ, about three-quarters of a year ago, had been blocked up with several lengths of strong planking with small openings between, the front barrier being strengthened by two planks inside crossing each other and extending from top to bottom. Great care had evidently been taken to prevent the organ from being approached without considerable difficulty. A small Police force having maintained guard at the north door during the night, a little before 10 o'clock yesterday morning about a dozen persons assembled there. All comers were at once informed by the Police that there was to be a service that morning, and the number assembled gradually increased up to 10:15, when the bell began ringing, and the north door was opened; the other main door near the vicarage on the west remaining closed throughout the morning. Rev. R. Dale arrived about 10, along with the Bishop's Secretary, and at 10:30 morning prayers commenced.

At first there were only about 100 persons present, but by gradual accessions the number swelled till the church was nearly filled. Full morning service was performed by Mr. Dale and Rev. Dr. Basil Craig, the former being the late Curate of Much Hadham, having previously been Curate of the large parish of St. Botolph, Colchester, for four years and a half, while the latter is Curate of St. John's, Chatham. The two clergymen first placed themselves just inside the chancel, one in each corner, and facing each other, Mr. Dale, now the licensed Curate of the church, wearing only a surplice and stole, and Dr. Craig having in addition to these the crimson hood of a Doctor of Divinity. Four laymen in ordinary attire sat in the stalls. Prayers were read by Mr. Dale, the lessons by Dr. Craig. During the earlier part of the service two or three young men who came in, on arriving opposite the altar bowed in a marked manner, one of them having crossed himself as he entered the church. During the reading of the communion service Mr. Dale stood at the corner on the north side looking southward, and Dr. Craig stood at the opposite corner facing the north—a relative position which with very slight exceptions was maintained throughout that part of the service. Mr. Dale read the Commandments with his face toward the people. Just before the sermon, having advanced in front of the chancel, he read the usual declaration of assent made by a stipendiary Curate, and ending with a request for the certificate of the church-wardens as to the fitness of his having done so. As he concluded, a voice from the middle of the church said, "Thank God." The sermon, which occupied about 20 minutes, contained no special reference to the matter so long in dispute between Mr. Tooth and part of his parishioners; on the contrary, there was apparently a studied avoidance of it, the preacher confining himself to a simple exposition of his text, and concluding by calling upon the parishioners to use the impending season of Lent for renewed dedication of themselves to God, and efforts to lead a life of Christian holiness. At the end of the sermon the prescher returned to the chancel. It was noticed that during the reading of the creed the two clergymen turned toward the east, but few persons in the congregation did so, and there was but little bowing at the name of Jesus. The congregation generally joined heartily in the responses. There was no offertory, and Mr. Dale, having read the prayer for the Church Militant after the sermon, dismissed the congregation with the benediction. The whole service, there being no celebration, lasted about an hour and a half. Immediately after the two clergymen retired from the chancel to the vestry there was a quiet, steady rush on the part of many of the congregation toward the chancel, and the gate having been left open a considerable number passed through, and in an orderly manner examined what remained, devoting special attention to the new simple altar, covered in front with green cloth. In the meantime the two church-wardens, Mr. Croom and Mr. Plimpton, had gone into the vestry to speak to Mr. Dale. Having introduced themselves to him, they asked to be allowed to see his license, which they read, following this up by an intimation that as they were too far off in the church to hear the whole of it read, they would rather not attach their signatures. The task was afterward performed by two parishioners, that being, it was said, sufficient for the purpose legally. The church-wardens having explained to Mr. Superintendent Gerson that the chancel had been "desecrated" by the persons who were in it, he ordered them to retire, and the order was instantly obeyed. Mr. Croom having made a similar complaint in the vestry, two or three persons there warmly repelled the imputation of "desecration," one gentleman observing that the chancel had indeed been "desecrated" by incense and other things of that kind, but that all such nonsense was now done away with. Outside the church a gentleman urged the friends of the Protestant League to bring with them as many friends as they could to the afternoon service, and this elicited a counter-entreaty to go to the meeting at the Cannon-street Hotel next Friday. There was afterward some slight uproar and pushing about 50 yards from the church, arising apparently out of a dispute between two opponents, but it was quickly subdued by the Police.

LIBERTY OF THE ENGLISH PRESS.

A LIBEL SUIT OF UNUSUAL INTEREST—SINGULAR DECISION RENDERED BY THE COURT OF APPEAL.

From the London Telegraph, Feb. 7.

A case of more than usual interest was decided on Saturday by the Court of Appeal, sitting at Westminster. The Lord Chief Justice and Lords Justices Mellish, Baggallay, and Bramwell were upon the bench, and the decision was that of the full court, each of the learned Judges giving in detail the particular reasons by which he had been guided to his conclusion. The original action was brought by Dr. Purcell, Medical Officer to the Board of Guardians of Altrincham, in the County of Chester, against Mr. Sowler, proprietor of a Manchester newspaper. It seems that at a meeting of the Altrincham Board certain of the gentlemen present had made, whether rightly or wrongly, some very strong remarks upon Dr. Purcell's conduct, imputing to him neglect of his duties, maladministration, cruelty, inhumanity, and various other grievous offenses. Dr. Purcell was precluded by law from bringing any action either against the Board of Guardians jointly or against the individual members of it who had so called his character in question. They were his employers, and consequently had a right to speak of his conduct in the discharge of his duties as they might think fit. Unfortunately, however, a reporter of the Manchester Courier was present at the meeting, and the paper with which he was connected published a full report of the proceedings, in which the obnoxious charges appeared in detail and at full length. Dr. Purcell, acting under the advice of his solicitor, brought an action against the newspaper on the ground that it had published a libel upon him. Solicitors, special pleaders, counsel, and other eminent legal luminaries were employed, and the cause was duly put down to be heard and determined upon circuit. When, however, the case was called on a compromise was agreed to, and a verdict for 40 shillings was taken by consent, subject to the point of law, subsequently raised, whether the report was privileged, or whether the proceedings before the Board of Guardians were of sufficient public interest to justify a full and complete account of them. This subtle legal question came on in due course before the Court of Common Pleas. Mr. Justice Brett, Mr. Justice Archibald, and Mr. Justice Lindley heard the arguments of counsel on both sides, and ultimately decided in favor of the plaintiff on the ground that the proceedings of the Board of Guardians are in no way matter of public interest and concern, and that consequently a newspaper is not justified in publishing a report of them. From this judgment the defendant, the proprietor of the Manchester Courier, appealed, and the Court of Appeal has decided against him, affirming the ruling of the inferior court, although upon different grounds from those on which the original decision was given. The Court of Common Pleas, as we have said, came to the conclusion that what was stated at a Board of Guardians is not matter of public interest, and that consequently a newspaper is not justified in publishing a full report of it. The Court of Appeal, with that love of subtle distinction which is the chief characteristic of lawyers, has ruled that what takes place at a Board of Guardians is matter of public interest, but that a newspaper is not on that account privileged to publish a full report of it. The consequence is that the original verdict for 40 shillings stands good, and that the plaintiff, Dr. Purcell, will recover his damages and the costs.

REAR ADMIRAL JOSEPH SMITH.

INTERESTING REMINISCENCES BY AN LIFE-LONG FRIEND—HOW HIS TWO ONLY SONS PERISHED IN THE CAUSE OF THE UNION.

From the Plymouth (Mass.) Old Colony Memorial.

Plymouth County has produced few men of whom she may be more proud than the late Rear Admiral Joseph Smith. He was born in Hanover, March 30, 1790. His father was Albert Smith, an extensive shipbuilder, and at one time High Sheriff of the county, and his mother's name before marriage was Anne Lenthal Eells. He was thus descended upon both sides from families long resident in, and identified with, the Old Colony. Among his ancestors were Rev. Thomas Smith, of Pembroke, Rev. Nathaniel Eells, of Scituate, and Rev. William Witherell, of Scituate.

The writer has not had time and opportunity for inquiring much into his earlier life, but enough to know that he was then the same wise, earnest, generous, high-souled man that acquaintance with him in later years has so clearly revealed. Kindness of the heart was always a conspicuous trait in his character. Early in life he parted with his estate received from his father, in Hanover, and made his residence elsewhere. This was about the year 1814, while he was a young man. But he never forgot his native town or any of his early friends. He may have lived in Maine awhile, where he married Harriet Bryant, of that State.

Quite early in life he entered the naval service of the United States. At the battle of Lake Champlain, Sept. 11, 1814, he was wounded, and he did gallant service at the capture of the Algerine cruisers in 1815. With these exceptions he had no opportunity to win fame at the "cannon's mouth." But he has done his country great and invaluable service. Admiral Smith, then Commodore, was Chief of the Bureau of Docks and Yards more than 30 years, that period embracing the years of our late civil war, so that the great Navy then created grew up under his direction and supervision. The opening of the war found him, an old man of 71 at the head of that important bureau, and better fitted to be there than any other man in the Navy. It was one of the fortunate things of those perilous times that this pure patriot of our Old Colony stock, with his clear and comprehensive mind and immense capacity for work, was there to carry that great burden. He built and saved the Navy, and perhaps the nation; as but for his personal efforts with President Lincoln the Monitor would not have been accepted by the Government when it was, and would not have been at Hampton Roads to save the fleet there, and the Merrimac might have reduced Fort Monroe and shelled Washington.

A commission was appointed by President Lincoln to examine as to the plan and value of the Monitor, and report to him. The report was adverse, but Smith alone of the commission was in favor of it, and to his persistent appeals for its acceptance, Mr. Lincoln said: "If you think so much of it, Smith, you may go on and have it built." Lincoln called much upon Admiral Smith, and called him "the old wheel-horse of the Navy"—not exactly a nautical figure of speech, but one easily understood.

His long, active, and eminently useful life came to a peaceful close, but he had passed through periods of the very heaviest afflictions. His dearly loved wife was killed in a terrible railroad accident between Washington and New-York. His son, Capt. Joseph Smith, an officer of such brilliant promise that had he lived he was sure to have reached the highest rank, was in command of the ill-fated Congress as she lay in James River, nearest of all our fleet to where the Merrimac was being plated with iron for its deadly work. This intrepid officer felt the gravity of the situation, and visiting Washington urged his father to hasten along the Monitor. The words of his farewell to his father that day had in them a sad presentiment of his swiftly approaching fate. The anxious father did all he could to hasten the departure of the new iron-clad. It was Sunday morning, April 10, 1862, that day when, as the dread intelligence of the first day's deadly devastations of the Merrimac was spread by telegraph, the heart of the loyal North stood still with fear. That Sunday forenoon Secretary Welles drove round to the church where he knew the pious Commodore was always to be found upon the Sabbath, and called him out. He said to him: "You know the unprotected state of the fleet at Fort Monroe, and that the Merrimac is expected out." The reply was, "Yes." "Well," continued the Secretary, "the Merrimac came out yesterday; we have no particulars yet, all we know is that the Cumberland has been sunk and the Congress struck her flag." "Then Joe is dead," said the father, as he turned and carried his great sorrow with him back into the house of God. He needed "no particulars." He knew the high heroic soul of his noble son so well that when told that his ship had struck her flag, he knew that son was dead. And so it proved. The next intelligence was that the first broadside of the Merrimac had killed the brave commander of the Congress. The Monitor, built because Admiral Smith believed in it, arrived that night in time to save the remainder of the fleet, too late to save the life of that brave son.

Great and brave father and son, each worthy of the other.

He had one other son—Capt. Albert Smith, who was in command on one of the vessels of Farragut's fleet, and went through a specially hard and perilous service in the passage up the river to the capture of the City of New-Orleans. The hardships encountered there broke down his health so that he was obliged to leave active service for bureau duty, and died before the close of the war. Thus he gave all he had to his country. Both of his sons died childless, and the Admiral leaves behind him no descendents, except an elderly unmarried daughter. Two sisters also survive. His home the last 30 years has been in Washington. In his later years we may well believe that he felt he had nothing to look forward to, except his home and crown in heaven, and of that his spotless and devoted religious life must have given him full assurance. That his thoughts were much with the past also is probable. Every Summer he came North to visit his sisters in Hanover, and always when there revisited the home of his boyhood with almost a boy's delight. All his life long he took a deep interest in his native State and in Massachusetts men, and great numbers of them have felt his helping hand. Those who mourn him are all over the land. We shall see his genial, kindly face, and listen to his cheery, friendly voice no more. A great and good man, he has gone to receive the rich reward awaiting the righteous.

COURT BALL IN BELGIUM.

THEIR MAJESTIES THE KING AND QUEEN AT HOME—KIND WORDS FOR AMERICANS—MAGNIFICENT TOILETS—THE QUEEN'S DRESS—HOW SUPPER WAS SERVED.

From the Belgium News, Feb. 3.

The first court ball of the season took place on Wednesday evening, and was most brilliantly attended. There was an unusual number of presentations, and a little after 8 o'clock the long line of those about to be presented to their Majesties extended from one end of the first drawing-room to the other. They then proceeded to the presentation room. The American presentations comprised Mr. Dunbar S. Merrill, son of his Excellency Mr. Ayres P. Merrill; Mrs. and Miss Gibson, Col., Mrs., and Miss Norma Christmas, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Pazolt, Mrs. and the Misses Hennings, (2,) Mrs. and the Misses Packard, (2.) There was an unusual number of fair "débutantes" among the Belgian ladies. It was not long before their Majesties entered, the doors from the private apartments being thrown open, and the Mistress of the Robes presented each lady to them, reading their names from a list she held in her hand. The English and Americans were presented first, and their Majesties had a most courteous word for each, and in their own tongue, and to everybody an appropriate and pleasant remark. The English and American gentlemen were then presented by their respective Ministers, Mr. Savile Lumley and Mr. Ayres P. Merrill, after which their Majesties entered the ball-room, followed by the Comte and Comtesse de Flandre, the ladies and gentlemen of their household, and the Corps Diplomatique. They then took their seats at the top of the room, and although the space was somewhat circumscribed, owing to the great numbers present, dancing was commenced and continued with much vigor, the perfect music and floor doubtless proving a great attraction.

Among the general company we noticed, besides those already presented, Mr. and Mrs. Allix, Mrs. Aubert, Miss Merrill and Miss Mimi Merrill, Col., Mrs., and Miss Blundell, Mrs. Carnsew, Mr. Drury, Mr. Freeling, Mr. Isaacs, Mr. Kirkpatrick, Mr. and Mrs. Lee, Miss Sweetman, Mr. Sweetman Fowell, Capt. and Mrs. Wildes, &c. The toilets were magnificent, and as usual at these balls, there was a splendid show of lace and jewels. Her Majesty the Queen, who was looking remarkably well, wore a beautiful dress of two shades of violet silk, trimmed with very fine Brussels point, and her magnificent diamonds. The Countess de Flandre was dressed in white satin and lace, also with splendid diamonds. Space forbids our enumerating many beautiful dresses, but we noticed one remarkable dress of a fair countrywoman—white velvet, trimmed with Neapolitan violets, and she carried a lovely bouquet of real violets. White predominated, and is always most becoming to fresh young faces. This last word reminds us of some young faces there, whose owners had unfortunately tried to enhance the charms of nature by those of art. This rarely succeeds as an improvement, even when very well done, and when departed youth gives perhaps some faint excuse for adventitious aid, but it is sad indeed to see young faces so disfigured, which, if left to themselves, would have been very good looking.

Soon after 11 o'clock the royal procession again formed, and led the way to the supper room, and we think the rule that is observed here is a very good one. Ladies and the Corps Diplomatique are only admitted while the royal party are in the supper-room, consequently the crush is never great, and the attendance is so perfect that everybody gets supper comfortably, and a magnificent repast it is. The King passes about recommending this and that delicacy to his guests, and we may certainly aver that you may travel through many countries and to many courts before you will find a more splendid entertainment than a Brussels court ball. Carriages were ordered at 12:30, and within an hour from that time all the gay throng had dispersed. More than 4,000 invitation cards have been issued for the balls of the 7th and 12th of February.

PREACHING TO ACTORS.

AN ENGLISH BISHOP ON THE STAGE.

AN ADDRESS TO THE ACTORS AND ACTRESSES OF MANCHESTER BY THE BISHOP OF THAT CITY.

At Manchester on Friday, Feb. 2, the Bishop of Manchester, in connection with the Church Mission, delivered an address in the Theatre Royal to the companies belonging to that and to the Queen's Theatre. The stalls were reserved for the chorus and the leading actors and actresses, while the pit was well filled by the other members of the several companies. In the "circles" were a considerable number of ladies and gentlemen who had received invitations from the management to be present. After a hymn had been sung and a prayer offered up, his Lordship proceeded to address the audience, who listened to him with marked attention. In the course of his remarks he observed that those who knew their Bible—and all, he hoped, knew it more or less—would remember in the days of old that in a great Asiatic city, a seat of vice and luxury, a distinguished preacher of the Gospel once, on a memorable occasion, was advised by a message from his friends that he should not venture into a theatre. He [the Bishop] fancied he must be the first Bishop of the Church of England, if he was not the first Bishop of Christ, who had ever addressed a congregation in a theatre. It was not that Paul was afraid of testifying to the Gospel of the grace of God anywhere or everywhere; it was not that he had any cowardly or selfish fears for his own personal safety or his own life; he was ready to enter when the occasion demanded, to spend and be spent in the service of his Master. But in the theatre of that day there was an excited and an angry crowd not in the humor to listen to reason. They would have been deaf to the gentle pleadings of the Spirit of God, and he wisely yielded to the counsel of his friends, and did not enter within those theatre walls. He [the Bishop] saw before him those who were willing to listen, or else he supposed they would not be present, and therefore he had ventured himself into the theatre, hoping that by the help of God he might be enabled to say something to them which would profit them on what he felt, and, he supposed, on what they felt, was the delicate and difficult and, he need not add, somewhat perilous work that they were engaged in doing. The Fathers of the early Church were very severe in their judgment upon stage players. The old Fathers of an ascetic turn of mind, like Tertullian and Cyprian, denounced stage plays and stage players in all forms of the most vehement language, and the early canons of the church refused baptism and even holy communion to actors until they had renounced their trade. He had admitted there was a difference now. The theatre in the early days of the Church was utterly corrupt and degraded. Any one who had read the picture of manners to be found in the pages of Juvenal, and in later writers—in the works of Gibbon—as to what a Roman theatre was in those days, could readily understand the new mood of earnest and somewhat over-stern minds would feel that those who could lend themselves to such degrading exhibitions as were to be witnessed in the Roman theatres and amphitheatres could have no other than a part in the deadly work against Christ did for the world. He would be quite content if the wholesome and sound moral influence of Christianity, which made us know and feel that purity and modesty in word and deed and gesture and conduct—he would be quite satisfied if those things could be found always to be the ruling principle in the theatre, as they ought to be found in that of every theatre, whether royal or not, in the land. A heathen teacher and philosopher, Aristotle, taught him that tragedy was a great instrument for purifying the passions. He thought no one would say who had seen any well-graced actor playing a part—a leading part—in any of Shakespeare's great tragedies, "Hamlet" or "Macbeth," or "Othello,"—that there was any doubt that incidents in the drama here and there verged on difficult in delicate points; and the language of the age was somewhat coarse and gross. Yet he thought no one would let a theatre where he had seen "Hamlet" or "Othello" well performed without in some sense or other feeling his whole nature elevated and strengthened, and even, if not spiritualized, at any rate the waters had been wholesome that he had drunk at. The one thing they had to look to was that the parts they played were honest, pure, and worthy. He did not think the player ought to be ashamed or afraid to refuse to take part in any drama which to any extent would compromise his proper dignity as a man or her proper modesty as a woman. If that resolution were in men's hearts, and women's hearts too, the stage would be purified. There were those who thought it would be better for society if theatres were kept out of sight, as once tried in England in the days of the Commonwealth, when what were called Puritan principles were in the ascendency. Theatres were closed, and no one was allowed to see a play performed; but there came a terrible reaction; there came the period of the Restoration; there came the plays which were now never seen—which no actor would study—no manager would put upon his boards; plays of Congreve, Farquhar, and Wycherley; and a woman wrote a play which even men today would blush to read or see. Well, he was glad that he had an opportunity to try to make to a slight extent the acquaintance of one or two actors. He remembered in 1853, when he was employed on a Government committee, he went to Sherborne, in Dorset, and there he found living in his own house, and occupied with all good things, teaching the ignorant, and going night by night to the ragged school, the great tragedian of the last generation, Macready. Again, in 1865, when he was traveling in Canada, he met on a steamer going down the St. Lawrence Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean. He spent two or three days in their company, and he never enjoyed any persons' society more. Last year he had the pleasure of meeting Miss Bowmore Martin, [Miss Helen Faucit,] as Lord Egerton's, at Tatton, and a more accomplished lady he thought they could not find. He therefore said that the stage need not necessarily be degrading to any one, and that it might be animated and pervaded by high and worthy motives.

At the conclusion of the address a hymn was sung, and the service brought to a close with the benediction. The Bishop then proceeded to the Prince's Theatre, and addressed a very numerous assembly of professional and other employes of that establishment. Speaking upon the reforms which he should like to see introduced into theatres, he said he did not think any one would say the theatre was a wrong place if the skirts of the ballet-dancers were a little longer. He did not think any person would say so if no woman was called upon to pose herself in a ballet or pantomime in any way opposed to her maidenly sense of womanly purity and modesty. No one would come to theatres—very often old men, who sat in the pit with their opera-glasses gazing upon poor girls, who if they had any of the feeling of women left in them, must shrink at the thought that they were exposed to such criticism—gazing upon them with gloating eyes, and wanting to see more than was denounced; these were the men who brought down the theatres and depraved the public taste. They should be ashamed to ask any young woman to compromise her maiden purity that men might look on and see, and those were the things that they had a right to claim should be put down, so that the stage might be a place where some Christian men and modest women could come and take their part, without having to think that they had done anything which degraded them either in the sight of their fellow-men or fellow-women, or even in the sight of God. He felt strongly upon the matter. At the Theatre Royal, Mr. Sidney, the manager, had thanked him for having spoken there; he hoped he had spoken kindly to those who had gathered there. Mr. Sidney said: "We players are a volatile race." Perhaps that was so, for their profession might make them so, and perhaps it made them a little unreal. Mr. Sidney encouraged him to think that he had not spoken in vain when he said that he [the Bishop] would find no persons whom he had addressed who would take his words more to heart than those connected with the theatrical profession. Volatility was not a sin, but there was a time to be serious, and he asked them to remember, whatever parts they played in the dramas that were enacted, that they had to play a part in the great drama of life, and that the King of Kings, whom they served, was watching every play and every bad thought or light word which escaped their lips, and he hoped they would do nothing, and would not be called upon to do anything, that would corrupt or imperil the souls of their fellow-men or fellow-men.

The hymn "Rock of Ages" was sung at the conclusion of the Bishop's address, and, his lordship having pronounced the benediction, the audience dispersed. At both houses very many of those present appeared to be deeply affected.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CHILDREN ENDANGERED

The Rochester Democrat of Monday morning says: "Just before the closing exercises of the First Methodist Episcopal Sunday-school yesterday afternoon, a fire broke out in the basement of the building in which they were assembled. A smell of smoke was noticed in the rooms before the fire was discovered, so that all were prepared to leave the church quietly and in order. A quiet alarm was given, as the flames had not gained sufficiently in headway to necessitate the sounding of a general alarm. It was some time before the flames could be extinguished, as the joists imbedded in the stone wall had taken fire, thus conveying the flames to a locality in which they were hard to reach. The fire originated in a hot-air pipe connected with the furnace. Had it not been discovered until a few minutes later, a panic might have been created, which would have resulted in loss of life."

LENTEN SUPPLY IN THE MARKETS.

General dullness prevails in the meat departments of the markets, Lent diminishing the demand. Prices, however, are no lower, the supply being lighter. Mr. Cornell, Clerk of Washington Market, stated yesterday that at this season, in his experience of 40 years as a butcher, meats were invariably higher in a wholesale way than at any other period. His explanation of the cause was, not that people ate more meat, but that a lesser quantity was sent to the City. Those who eat meat in Lent may be interested to know that Spring Lamb is in market. It is very dear, an animal weighing about 22 pounds costing $15 to $16. None but the most fashionable restaurants and the very wealthy buy the expensive luxury. The business of the venders of poultry is as dull as is that of the butchers. Turkeys and chickens of the best quality can be bought at Washington Market for 18 cents per pound, ducks at 18 cents to 20 cents, and geese at 12 cents to 14 cents. Fish is in good demand, the season bringing it into favor. There is a large variety offered by the fishmongers, shad, striped bass, and lake fish of different descriptions being regarded as the choicest morsels, and cod, haddock, and halibut as staples. The greater part of the shad received, as well as the halibut, is fresh from the waters of Georgia. Prices for all kinds of fish, except shad, striped bass, and salmon, are reasonable. Cod and haddock sell at 8 cents per pound, halibut at 15 cents, pickerel at 18 cents, white-fish at 16 cents to 18 cents, perch at 10 cents, Newfoundland herring at 7 cents to 8 cents, smelts at 6 cents to 12 cents, black lake bass at 15 cents to 18 cents, flounders at 8 cents, eels at 15 cents to 18 cents, ciscos (a species of white fish) at 10 cents, red snappers, from Florida, at 15 cents to 18 cents, and carp from the lakes of Western New-York at 15 cents. Shad sell all the way from 50 cents to $1, according to size and quality, and small shad roes (weighing about a quarter of a pound) at 10 cents. Striped bass sells at 20 cents to 25 cents per pound, and Kennebec salmon at 30 cents. Butter and eggs are lower. Excellent qualities of butter sold last evening in Washington Market at 32 cents per pound, and fresh laid eggs from New-Jersey and near points could have been bought by shrewd buyers at 18 cents per dozen, although hucksters in the markets were asking 25 cents for 14 and 16. Retail prices for apples and cranberries are unchanged, and grapes and oranges are higher. Vegetables of all kinds are pretty low priced. New Bermuda potatoes are more plentiful and cheaper. They can be bought for $6 to $7 per barrel, and were peddled in the markets last night at 40 cents per half peck. Excellent lettuce, raised in Boston hothouses, sold at 8 cents to 10 cents per head, and three bunches of good celery at 25 cents.

RECEIPTS FOR THE TABLE.

CLAM SOUP, I.—Thirty hard clams; put them in a pot with two quarts of water; boil two hours; then take out the clams, chop them fine, and return them to the pot with one dozen pepper corns and a small shred of mace, and boil an hour; rub a piece of butter, the size of a pullet's egg, with two tablespoonfuls flour; boil a pint of milk and dissolve the buttered flour in it, and stir till smooth; have this ready, and when the clams have been boiled the last hour strain the soup into the tureen and stir in the thickened milk, but do not boil it after the milk is put in; then serve hot. This makes a delicious clam soup.—NORRISTOWN, PENN.

CLAM SOUP, II.—Strain the liquor from the clams; add to a pint of juice or a little less one quart of water or milk, a dessert spoonful of black pepper, and a teaspoonful of sweet marjoram; rub flour and butter to a cream and add to the liquid when boiling; wash the clams free from grit and put in the pot, boiling them slowly one hour, or chop them fine before adding; skim the clams out before sending to table; put toasted bread cut in small squares in the tureen and pour the soup boiling over them.—AUNT ADDIE.

BAKED CLAMS.—Take 50 large soft clams; wash thoroughly; slice, very thin, indeed, four good sized boiled cold potatoes, and mince very fine one large white boiled onion; butter a baking-dish; place in a layer of clams, then potatoes, with a little onion, a sprinkle of black and cayenne pepper mixed, and a very little powdered mace, a little butter, and some rolled cream or soda crackers; must be very fine; repeat until you have used up the clams; pour over it equal parts of milk and water, sufficient to two-thirds fill the dish; put a good paste over the top, and bake three-quarters of an hour if your oven is hot.—AUNT ADDIE.

BROILING STEAK.—To broil a beefsteak, have your coals very hot and rub them with a piece of fat cut from the steak; see that the fire is bright and clear, and the drafts of the range or stove open; then put on the steak, or mutton chops; turn constantly, so often that the outside of the meat will be cooked quickly and the juices kept in the meat, and not rise to the outside. Have your dish hot, with butter on it, and salt and pepper rubbed together with the butter; turn the steak in this and send to table as quickly as possible.—AUNT ADDIE.

MEAT BALLS.—Chop very fine cold meat of any kind, and soak the same quantity of bread crumbs; mix them together with an onion chopped very fine; if the flavor of onion is liked, season with salt and pepper, a little nutmeg and allspice; mold together with one egg; form into balls, and fry in boiling fat.—AUNT ADDIE.

BEEF HASH.—Use stale bread soaked in milk or water; season with butter, pepper, and salt, and a little onion chopped fine; make into cakes, and fry a light brown.—ERIN.

POTATO CAKES.—Boil some white potatoes, mash them very fine, adding salt, butter, and milk as if used as a vegetable; then mold in them sufficient sifted flour to make them into a soft dough; roll them out on the paste-board about an inch thick; cut in small square cakes; fry on a griddle greased with equal parts of lard and butter; cook slowly, turning but once. Nice for breakfast, or an ordinary lunch.—AUNT ADDIE.

TO COOK OYSTER PLANT.—Scrape and wash it; boil in water, with a little salt added; when soft cut it in pieces and fry in butter, or else serve hot without frying, but with drawn butter; you can also mash them and form into cakes and brown in butter; it will turn black if left exposed to the air after scraping or when it gets cold.—AUNT ADDIE.

NEW-ENGLAND BAKED BEANS.—Take an earthen bean pot, small at the top, holding about two quarts. Take a quart of small beans, (which are the best for baking,) and after picking clean, soak in cold water over night; turn off the water the next morning; place on the top of the beans one pound of clear fat salt pork; cut into squares on the rind; sprinkle a little salt over all; fill up with cold water, place in the oven at 7 A. M., and bake until 6 P. M. The New-England people always bake their beans all day, look at them once or twice during the day, and if dry, add a little hot water.—AUNT HARRIETT.

LEMON PIE.—The juice and grated rind of three lemons, three eggs well beaten, three tablespoonfuls of sugar to each lemon; one crust.—LILLIE.

VINEGAR PIE.—One cupful sugar, one-half cupful vinegar, boil together a few minutes, cool, and add one tablespoonful flour, one tablespoonful condensed egg, one rolled milk cracker, one teaspoonful butter. Bake in two crusts.—AUNT ADDIE.

DANDY PUDDING.—One quart of milk, the yolks of four eggs, three tablespoontuls of corn-starch, a little sugar; scald the milk, and when very hot stir into it the corn-starch and eggs, stirring it briskly until it thickens; when done, turn into a pudding dish; when quite cold, pour over it a frosting made of the whites of the eggs, allowing a tablespoonful of sugar to each egg; flavor with lemon juice; brown slightly in the oven.—LILLIE.

CRULLERS.—One cupful sugar, one tablespoonful butter, two eggs, one cupful milk, one quart flour, two teaspoonfuls sea-foam, a little grated nutmeg.—LILLIE.

SEA FOAM.—This can be used in making all kinds of cake, griddle-cakes, dumplings, light pastry, &c.

FRENCH LOAF-CAKE.—Two cupfuls white sugar, one scant cupful butter, one cupful sweet milk, three heaping cupfuls flour, three eggs, two teaspoonfuls cream tartar, one teaspoonful soda. Put sugar, butter, soda, cream tartar, eggs, (not previously beaten,) all together; beat to a froth; add the milk, beating well; flavor with lemon extract; add the flour gradually; pour into a cake-tin, lined with buttered paper, and sprinkle a little powdered sugar on top before baking.—EVA.

SPONGE CAKE.—Six eggs, two cupfuls sugar, two cupfuls flour, one teaspoonful cream tartar in the flour, a half teaspoonful soda dissolved in a little warm water and added the last thing; beat the yolks and the sugar together; add the whites, well beaten, then the flour, and lastly the soda.—GILMANTON.

MAMMA'S FRUIT CAKE.—One pound of sugar, three-quarters pound of butter, three pounds of currants, three pounds of raisins, one-half pound of citron, nine eggs, one pound of flour, one gill of brandy, one-half cupful molasses; spice to suit taste.—LILLIE.

LADY CAKE.—One half cupful butter, one and one-half cupfuls sugar, two-thirds of a cupful milk, two cupfuls flour, three eggs, one teaspoonful cream tartar, one-half teaspoonful soda; flavor to suit.—VERITAS.

STALE BREAD CAKES.—Soak a pint of stale pieces of bread in warm milk enough to cover them; when they are quite soft add a teaspoonful salt, one quart of flour, two teaspoonfuls baking powder, and two tablespoonfuls condensed eggs, dissolved in a little warm milk; add milk sufficient to form a batter to fry on a griddle.—AUNT ADDIE.

LADY FINGERS, I.—In one pound powdered sugar break 11 eggs, and beat together until so light that no hair-line will form in the froth; then add one pound of sifted flour, stirring in very lightly; butter some sheets of paper, pour the cake through a pipe made for the purpose or a paper funnel, on the paper, in cakes three inches long and very narrow; sift powdered sugar over the top; bake in rather a quick oven, and do not take them from the paper until cold.—AUNT ADDIE.

LADY FINGERS, II.—Two eggs beaten very light; one cupful white sugar added; a half teaspoonful cream tartar, the same of soda, and flour enough to make a stiff dough. Put the cream tartar with the flour, and dissolve the soda with a little warm water. Roll out, sprinkle with sugar, and cut in pieces the size of middle fingers. Place on buttered paper in tins, not letting them touch each other, and do not let them bake very brown.—GILMANTON.

GENUINE GINGER SNAPS.—An old housekeeper suggests that all so-called "ginger snaps" in which soda or anything of that nature is found are simply "cookies," which, like all such preparations, soon dry and become stale. The following receipt will make crisp, rich snaps, which can be kept in an air-tight cake box for a long time: One pound of shortening, (equal parts of butter and lard,) one pint of molasses, one-half pint of brown sugar, one tablespoonful ginger, one teaspoonful cloves or cinnamon, flour; well mixed until it becomes a pliant dough. To be rolled thin and baked in a quick oven.

BLANKETS.—Into one quart of milk put a lump of butter the size of an egg; let the milk get warm enough to melt the butter; stir in flour sufficient to form quite a stiff batter, and a dessert spoonful of salt; have ready lake compressed yeast dissolved in a little warm water; cover tightly; let stand in a warm place over night; fry on griddle.—AUNT ADDIE.

SUGGESTIONS ABOUT BREAD.—The quicker bread rises the whiter it will be, and it is far nicer to mold it on a large towel or an old table-cloth folded, with a little flour sifted over it, than on a molding-board.—AUNT ADDIE.

FRENCH CREAM.—One quart of boiled milk; mix one cupful sugar with the yolks of four eggs; stir into the milk with one tablespoonful corn starch; flavor to taste; beat the whites to a stiff froth with pulverized sugar, and brown slightly in the oven.—LILLIE.

TOMATO SOY.—Two large cans of tomatoes, one pound dark brown sugar, one-half pint vinegar, and one-half ounce of whole cloves; boil slowly until reduced very rich and thick. It is very nice with meats, poultry, or game.—AUNT ADDIE.

USEFUL FAMILY HINTS.

SULPHUR MIXTURE FOR THE BLOOD.—Five teaspoonfuls powdered sulphur to one of cream tartar; mix with molasses; take one teaspoonful three successive mornings, then omit three, and so on until it has been taken nine times.—AUNT LOTTIE.

TO RESTORE THE HAIR AFTER ILLNESS.—Equal parts of best brandy and strong black tea, shaken well together and rubbed well into the roots of the hair once daily, will usually restore the hair after long illness. Be careful not to scratch or irritate the scalp with tough combing and brushing. The mixture should be made at least once in three days, even in cool weather.

ONE WAY TO USE BORAX.—Pulverized borax, if properly applied, will clear any house of Croton bugs. Four years ago we were over-run with them. I bought four pounds of borax and made a line of it around every room, on the carpet, close up to the wood-work, also on the backs of the mantels, and around every shelf of every closet. I threw handfuls of it around all the wash-basins and water-pipes; I used it freely around the boiler and sink and wash-tubs, in the kitchen; I sifted it over the tops of doors and between mattresses, and in bureau drawers. I instructed the servants to disturb it as little as possible. When the next week's sweeping and scrubbing were done, I applied it again. A third time I repeated the dose, and at the end of a month not a Croton bug was to be found in the house. We also had large black roaches, which, in warm weather, came up from the cellar, and went all over the house. It also destroyed them. Every Spring and Fall I use a pound of borax, generally around the kitchen. For years we have enjoyed a blessed immunity from these disgusting pests.—S. B. N.

REMEDY FOR A CANARY'S ASTHMA.—Dip a small feather in pure sweet oil and pass up the nose; if once does not effect a cure, try again, being careful and not get any oil around the eyes; at the same time give the bird red pepper tea, well sweetened, and a little milk in it.—A LOVER OF BIRDS.

TO CLEAN WALNUT STAIRS.—Milk, sour or sweet, well rubbed into black-walnut stairs with an old soft flannel will make them look perfectly new.

DRIVING OFF CROTON BUGS.—If the distracted housekeeper will begin at the top of her house with a powder bellows and a large quantity of freshly powdered borax, and puff it thoroughly into every crack and crevice, whether or not there are Croton bugs in them, to the very bottom of her house, special attention being paid to old furniture, closets, and wherever Croton water is introduced, she will be freed from these torments. The operation may require a repetition, but the end is success.

BLACK ROACH TRAP.—Fill an earthen or tin wash basin three parts full of water sweetened with molasses, wetting the edge with the same; wrap a cloth around in such a way that the roaches can easily crawl up; an inning blanket answers the purpose well; set it on the kitchen floor on retiring, and the result will be satisfactory. This may work for water bugs as well.—ERIN.

TO RID A HOUSE OF RATS.—Wet a few pounds of unslacked lime with strong lye made from potash; let it be quite soft; spread it around the holes so that the rats cannot avoid treading in it; let it remain a week or two, and if it gets dry scrape it off and moisten again. The mixture burns their feet and they will not be likely to make a second visit. Do not let it come in contact with oil-cloth or paint.—ERIN.

PAPER DOLLS.—Select a colored chromo picture of a young lady with low necked dress—hair tastefully arranged—cut away all below the line where the neck joins the dress, and gum the picture into a sheet of thick, white Bristol board. Sketch the figure of the doll on the board making her appear in a plain, white dress, and have the arms in such a position that they can afterward be brought before the dresses when they are made. Ask some artist friend to color the arms to match the neck, or by mixing vermilion, yellow ochre, and white to the tint in water colors; anyone may try it. The doll should be from six to ten inches tall. When drawn and colored, cut the figure out. For the dresses, lay the doll on a sheet of foolscap letter paper; with a sharp lead pencil take the shape of the waist and shoulders; then, either guided by some fashion plate or your own taste, make the outline of a trained evening dress, making a graceful sweep to the skirt; cut this out. If it doesn't suit you try again, and when a nice fit and proper sweep to the drapery are obtained, take the dress as a foundation for a succession of fillings from silk or cloth, and so construct a handsome dress. This is done by cutting a long strip of white or light silk (preparing it as for the flounce of a wax or china doll) and plaiting around the bottom of the skirt. This forms an underskirt, over which a full overskirt may be draped and a dainty waist added to complete the costume. Only the front will be shown, so the stitches may be plainly on the back. Gold or crystal beads may be used as ornament.—LADY ARTIST.

HOW A BLIND WOMAN THREADS A NEEDLE

The Baltimore Sun of Saturday says: "Among the large number of patients who sought treatment at Dr. Chisolm's free eye and ear dispensary yesterday were two sisters, one 84 and the other 80 years of age, who lived together for mutual support. They were both active in limb, and had walked over a mile to visit the dispensary. The elder sister of 84 lost an eye from accident many years since. The younger of 80 lost both eyes from inflammation 40 years ago, so that for half her long life she has been totally blind. One eye, and that a crippled one, did the family work, except the sewing, which was done by the blind sister for both parties. She retained such delicacy of touch even in her old age that she could thread an ordinary sized needle with ease, and even a fine one after a few efforts. Her method of threading reversed that commonly adopted. Having cut off squarely the end of the thread she held it fixed between her fingers and brought the eye of the needle up to it, and often at the first trial would pass the end of the thread through the eye."

THE CHAMPION CRICKETER.

A public meeting was held at Berkeley Castle, England, recently, Lord Fitzhardinge presiding, to organize a national testimonial to Mr. W. G. Grace, the champion cricketer. During the proceedings Dr. Grace said his brother's intention was to retire from cricketing and follow his profession as a surgeon after this season. The Duke of Beaufort suggested the testimonial should take the form of a piece of plate and a heavy purse. An influential committee was appointed, with Lord Fitzhardinge as treasurer, and upward of £120 was subscribed in the room. The subscription list will be kept open till September.

MILITARY GOSSIP.

At an election held in the Separate Troop Cavalry, Fifth Brigade, Brooklyn, last Thursday evening, Orderly Sergt. J. H. Thun was elected Second Lieutenant.

The Ninth Brigade, Albany, Gen. Woodhall commanding, paraded on Washington's Birthday. The Twenty-fifth Regiment turned out 300; the Tenth Regiment, 397 men, and Battery A, Artillery, 38 officers and men.

Sergt. Lewis Curtis, No. 300 East Seventy-sixth-street, challenges any member of the National Guard, "barring" Burroughs, of Company I, Twelfth Regiment, to an exhibition drill at the State Arsenal on Tuesday, March 20.

Capt. Frederick A. Baldwin, of Company B, Thirteenth Regiment, has received three months' leave of absence, and it is said he contemplates tendering his resignation upon the expiration of his furlough. Capt. Baldwin has been connected with the National Guard nearly thirty years.

The Non-commissioned Officers' Association of the Fourteenth Regiment, Brooklyn, had a ball at Gallatin Hall, in that city, on the evening of Washington's Birthday. A large attendance of the members and friends of the regiment made the event one of the most successful of the season.

The Separate Troop Cavalry, Major Karl Klein, commanding, drilled in mounted movements at its armory last Wednesday evening. Thirty-eight members were present, and the drill was chiefly confined to the movements of mounting and dismounting, and other simple movements. A platoon of old members drilled for an hour, after which the latest recruits were put through similar evolutions. Another mounted drill will be had next Wednesday evening.

At the regular monthly meeting of Company G, Seventh Regiment, First Lieut. E. Graham Haight was presented by his company with an elegant sword, suitably inscribed, and a complete set of officer's equipments. Lieut. Haight was practically elected to his present position from the ranks, having enlisted as a private on Dec. 18, 1876, he was promoted Sergeant, and on Jan. 12, First Lieutenant, all within a month. Corp. Charles E. Snevilly was chosen Sergeant, and Henry B. Lockwood was promoted Corporal.

Col. Charles S. Spencer, commanding the Fifth Regiment, has received a handsome pair of plated revolvers from the State Military Association. The field musicians of this regiment held their nineteenth annual exhibition last Monday evening at the regimental armory. A large audience was present, the musicians performed their part to the satisfaction of everybody, and a late supper was duly appreciated by members and invited guests. Second Lieut. Heinrich Rugen, of Company A, has been promoted First Lieutenant, vice Kedenburg resigned. An election has been ordered to fill the vacancy caused by the promotion of Lieut. Rugen, to be held to-morrow evening in the armory.

Adjt. Gen. Franklin Townsend has asked for an appropriation of $300,000 for the maintenance of the National Guard of this State for the current year. Now, as every military man knows, this is not an exorbitant sum to ask for defraying the necessary expenses of the department. For several years past the General Head-quarters of the State National Guard has been in a chronic condition of poverty. Not even a regiment could be ordered into camp, let alone a brigade or division. Overcoats have not been provided, and the various military rifle ranges throughout the State have been only half completed for want of money. That the several departments have been economically, not to say niggardly, conducted, there is no doubt, and the request of the Adjutant General should be granted by the Legislature, to enable him to maintain for the Militia of this State a standing equal to the "citizen soldiery" of other States.

The Eighth Regiment, Col. George D. Scott commanding, is under orders to assemble in fatigue uniform, for drill and instruction by wings, as follows: Right wing, companies E, A, D, C, and I, on Monday, March 19; Left wing, companies H, G, F, and B, on Tuesday, March 27. Roll will be called at 7:45 o'clock P. M. Officers of companies when using the squad drill room are directed to instruct their commands in accordance with the rules laid down in Wingate's Manual of Rifle Practice, as follows: Art. 2. "Theoretical instruction;" Art. 3. "Signals;" Art. 4. "Position drill;" Art. 5. "Aiming drill." Each instruction will conclude with target practice, in which the indicators provided will be used. Capt. Edward Barker, Regimental Inspector of Rifle Practice, will supervise the drill and will make reports of the progress attained to the Colonel. The regular monthly meeting of the board of officers of this command will take place on Monday evening, March 14, at 8 o'clock.

The Twenty-third Regiment, Brooklyn, Col. R. C. Ward commanding, is under orders to assemble for drill by wings, in fatigue uniform, at its armory, as follows: Right Wing, Companies A, D, E, and F, Thursday evenings, March 1, 15, and 29; April 12 and 26. Left Wing, Companies B, C, G, and K, on Tuesday evenings, March 6 and 20; April 3 and 17, and May 1. The regimental band will give another of its popular concerts at the armory, Clermont, near Myrtle avenue, next Saturday evening. Commissions have been issued to First Lieut. Frank E. Westlake and Second Lieut. Thomas B. Adams. Warrants have been granted to the following non-commissioned officers: Sergt. John G. Koop, Jr., Corps. Asa C. Brownell and August J. Dwenger, Company K; Corps. William S. Banta and Harry O. Jones, Company C; First Sergt. Charles E. McClellan, Sergts. Edward C. Halsey, and Corp. Dwight C. Pinney, Company D; Corp. W. E. Cutting, Company F; Sergt. John J. Barsdoliar, Jr., and Corp. Charles G. H. Story, Company B.

Major Gen. Alexander Shaler, commanding the First Division, has appointed Corp. E. Horrison Sanford, of the Seventh Regiment, to the position of Inspector of Rifle Practice on his Staff, vice Lieut. Col. W. B. Farwell, resigned. At First Division Head-quarters the return of election has been received of Second Lieut. Charles F. Hoffman and First Lieut. E. Graham Haight, Seventh Regiment. Tenders of resignation have been received from Capt. J. Allen and First Lieut. John Morris, Sixty-ninth Regiment. The resignations have been accepted of Lieut. Col. W. B. Farwell, Division Inspector of Rifle Practice; Capt. J. S. Hart and First Lieut. S. J. Levy, Eighth Regiment; Quartermaster R. W. Booth, Jr., Ninth Regiment; Capt. F. C. Bailey and Second Lieut. James Shand, Seventy-first Regiment. Commissions have been awarded to Quartermaster Edgar S. Waite, Capt. George W. Homans, and Second Lieut. M. J. Bauman, Ninth Regiment. The parade returns for the uniform fund of the Sixty-ninth Regiment show the number entitled to credit to be 396 men.

The left wing of the Seventy-first Regiment, Companies G, C, E, I, and F, Col. Richard Vose commanding, will parade in fatigue uniform, with white belts, at the State Arsenal, for drill and instruction, next Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock. Major E. A. McAlpin will assume command on that occasion. Col. Vose will order a full dress parade of his command at the State Arsenal on Monday, March 12, for the purpose of presenting to the successful members the badges won by them at Creedmoor last Summer. There is no truth in any rumor, recently published, to the effect that this regiment will adopted a "new uniform." Application has been made for brevet commissions of Major, for Capt. Abram Webber, of Company G, and Capt. Amos L. See, of Company H, in this command, both officers having held their positions for a continuous period of 10 years. The drum corps of this command, under the direction of Drum Major Nathaniel Jenks, will perform a tattoo at a reception to be given in aid of the Fifth Universalist Society, at the Lexington Avenue Opera-house, Fifty-eighth-street, next Wednesday evening.

The left wing of the Twenty-second Regiment drilled at the Armory in West Fourteenth-street last Friday evening, under command of Col. Josiah Porter. Line was formed with five companies of 12 files. After an exercise in the manual, the command was instructed in loading and firing drill by files, companies, and battalions. After these movements the following were executed: Forming double columns of fours; right and left front into line; from line into column of companies, at a halt and while marching. The drill was considered as the best of the season. At the close of the drill Capt. Loomis instructed the men in rifle practice. At an election held in Company K last Friday evening, the following officers were elected: First Lieut. Thomas M. Daly, Captain; Second Lieut. Charles D. Sabin, First Lieutenant; and Sergt. Leonard G. Van Vechten, Second Lieutenant. The vacancy caused by the promotion of Sergt. Van Vechten will be filled at an election next Thursday evening. An election will be held to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Capt. Charles D. Coppins next Wednesday night. The candidates are First Lieut. Henneberger, of Company G, and Second Lieut. Charles T. Smith, of Company B. Major John H. Horsfall passed the Board of Examination of the First Brigade last Wednesday evening by answering 84 per cent. of the questions propounded. The following non-commissioned officers have been granted warrants: Corporal James P. Kenworthy, Company A; Corporal E. L. Clapp, Company E; Sergts. Victor F. Maidhof and William B. Smith, Company E; Corporal Henry M. Howell, Company F.

At a meeting of the staff officers of the First Brigade, on Saturday evening, the 17th inst., Lieut. Col. John T. Denny, Assistant Adjutant General of that command, received as a testimonial a handsome badge. The trophy is an enlarged copy of the representative staff insignia. It represents the Cross of the Legion of Honor, encircled by a Roman laurel wreath, and a garter. Upon the five arms of the cross are the letters "N. G. S. N. Y.," respectively, and the legend "First Brizade." adorns the garter. The badge depends from a broad ribbon, which also bears the devices representing the various grades of rank held by the recipient, together with the titles of the respective offices which Col. Denny has filled. Upon the reverse side was the inscription "Presented to Brevet Col. John T. Denny, by his associates of the Staff of the First Brigade, in testimony of their appreciation of his long and faithful service, Feb. 17, 1877." A brevet commission of Colonel had just been granted to Lieut. Col. Denny, under the date of Feb. 15, 1877. Col. Denny was first appointed upon the First Brigade staff on Jan. 4, 1867, as Paymaster, but four months later that office was abolished by the Legislature, and he was then appointed Ordnance Officer, in the same brigade, on May 3, 1867; on Nov. 7, 1870, he was promoted Engineer, and on the retirement of Col. Anthony, on July 31, 1874, he was appointed Adjutant General and Chief of Staff—a position which he has since occupied with dignity and ability. Col. Denny now contemplates the tender of his resignation, owing to the increase of his private business, and it is probable that Major Robert Lenox Belknap, the present Inspector of the Brigade, will be appointed as his successor.

The Forty-seventh Regiment, Brooklyn, Col. D. E. Austen commanding, held a rehearsal of the drill in street firing movements, at its armory, last Friday evening. The regular drill in these movements will take place next Friday evening. The Gatling Battery of Artillery, Capt. John A. Edwards commanding, will drill in conjunction with the infantry on that occasion, and the event will be an interesting one to military men generally. Mayor Schroeder and a number of division and brigade officers from both the First and Second Divisions, have been invited to be present. The drill will be given in honor of Major Gen. E. L. Molineux, to whom Col. Austen's text-book on street firing drill has been dedicated. The drill will practically demonstrate the utility of the manual as far as the limited accommodations afforded by the armory will permit. Some of the Brooklyn tax-payers in the West Division, who have exhibited considerable enthusiasm at the action of the Supervisor at large in voting the bill providing for the expenditure of $30,000, for the purpose of giving this regiment a new armory, have apparently overlooked the fact that the sum of $60,000 has been appropriated for the enlargement of the Portland Avenue Arsenal, which was a better building than the present armory of this command before the alterations were commenced. The Board of Supervisors of Brooklyn is now considering the project of disposing of the armory at present occupied by Company I of this command at Greenpoint, Long Island. As such a movement would entail the disbandment of the company, this action on the part of the Brooklyn officials lacks wisdom, to say the least. Besides, a movement towards the organization of another company in that locality for this command has gained considerable ground, in which event both companies would occupy the same quarters, with no additional expense to the county.

The right wing of the Twelfth Regiment had a drill at the State Arsenal last Monday evening, under the direction of Lieut. Col. Cruger. The battalion was equalized in four companies of 12 files front. A feature of the drill was the retirement of the Captains of the several companies to the line of file closers, leaving junior Lieutenants in command. The first part of the drill included the movements of marching in a column of fours, on right into line, to and on the right close column of divisions. These movements were all well executed, but when the commandant commenced the movements of playing and deploying from line into column and from column into line, the Lieutenants were generally "at sea," in many cases neither officer appeared to know who should command the divisions, and confusion resulted. This state of affairs was particularly noticeable in formation and deployment of the double column. The manual showed a decided improvement over previous drills. On the following evening the left wing was drilled in similar movements by Major Wilson. The same rule of placing the companies under command of Lieutenants was observed, and a similar lack of confidence and knowledge of the duties of a commandant were developed. The step observed in the "columns of fours" was too slow, and the formation in single ranks was "ragged." The manual was not as well executed as on the previous evening, and certainly the members ought to pay more attention to these details. The action of this command in allowing Lieutenants to command their companies occasionally, will be productive of good results in future exhibition parades. Adjutant William H. Murphy has received a brevet commission for long and faithful service. Capt. Murphy enlisted in the Twelfth Regiment as a private, in Company A, on April 19, 1861, and commanded the regiment during the war. In June, 1863, he was appointed First Sergeant of his company, while the regiment was stationed at Fort McHenry, Maryland. After the regiment returned to this City, he resigned his position and was unanimously elected Sergeant of his company. During the riots of 1863, he was detailed Sergeant Major of the regiment by Gen. Ward, then Colonel of this command, receiving a full warrant on Oct. 3, 1873. He retained that position until May 29, 1867, when he was appointed Adjutant by Col. Ward, and has filled that office ever since. During the first seven years of his term of service he was only twice absent from parade or drill, and one of these occasions was warranted by a severe illness. For the past two years he has invariably been promptly at his post. Capt. Murphy has repeatedly declined promotion in the line of his regiment, and has refused the proffer of field officers' positions in this and other regiments in the division, preferring to retain his place as Adjutant.

AMATEURS SINGING FOR A PRIZE.

The Boston Post of the 22d inst. says: "The grand amateur vocal contest, which was announced some weeks ago, took place last evening at Music Hall, and attracted quite an audience to witness the first experiment in competitive concerts in this city. The original plan embraced four classes of contestants: Lady soloists, sopranos and contraltos; gentlemen soloists, tenors and bassos; duets and trios, male or mixed voices, and quartet or small chorus singing. Owing to the numerous entries the last two were omitted, and the contest was narrowed down to the soloists, who numbered 26 in all classes. The class of music sung was as diversified as the singers. It ran all the way from the floating meadow ditties of the music stores to Italian arias of elaborate character, and the competitors ranged from the treading ingénue who gave the audience almost a profile view to the confident and ready warblers who attacked the notes with a boldness that was intended to carry the listeners by storm and force approval from the judges. Some of the singers were good enough to be enjoyable; others were badenough to be ridiculous. The practice of counterpoint proved insufficient for the demands of Music Hall, and some who had doubtless paddled very comfortably in a musical millpond were unable to keep their balance on the crest of a wave. In several instances it was apparent that the accompanist and vocalist could not proceed together, and, it being the latter's doings, he or she was allowed, to the without the pale of contrast. The basso who sang 'The Bridge' came near finding it an Ashtabula structure, and breaking down before he got over. The audience, however, was good natured, though sometimes confusing in its demonstrative enjoyment of defects as well as excellences, and very few left before the last note was warbled. It would have made the occasion more enjoyable from a musical point of view had a higher standard been adhered to in receiving applications. On the other hand, some would have lost a valuable lesson had they not been allowed to see how small their parlor and schoolroom melodies seemed in certain conjunctions. The judges were Mr. B. D. Allen, of Worcester, and Messrs. F. H. Jenks, and J. H. Stickney. Their decisions, which satisfied the audience even if all failed to do as much for some of the contestants, were as follows: In the first class, soprano, Miss Katie M. Studley, prize, song, 'Let me dream Again;' honorable mention, Mrs. E. M. Hartley, and Mrs. Winifred S. Ames. In the second or tenor class, the prize was given to Mr. N. J. Hall, and diplomas to Mr. W. H. Bullard, and F. A. Pingree. In the contralto class, Miss Jennie L. Gorham received the prize, and Miss Edith Davis and Miss M. K. Shacklord honorable mention. Dr. Hallick was the chosen basso, and Messrs. W. H. Rand and F. E. Smith were honorably noticed. The Waverley Quartet gave a couple of pleasing selections in good style, and Mr. J. H. O'Connor sang Mr. Brown's Serenade,' one of Mr. Barnabee's pieces, with good musical and dramatic effect."

HE NEVER SKATED AGAIN.

The Ogdensburg Journal has this reminiscence: "It was in 1816. The old man, then young, had seen the boys skate. It appeared so easy that he determined to make a Sunday trip to Ogdensburg, over the glare ice, on skates. The wind was blowing a stiff breeze up the river. He walked to the lower end of the town, put on his skates and started. At the end of an hour's hard work he stopped to take an observation and found that he had gone to leeward just one mile, that is the wind had blown him up the river above the town. He concluded that the attempt to get to Ogdensburg in that way was a failure, and he took off his skates utterly disgusted and never put them on again. A few years later he was hopelully converted to the faith of John Wesley, and still lives a pillar in the church, and he is not so old that he cannot smile, audibly, at his want of success with that Sunday's skate."

WAGES IN GEORGIA.

The Columbia (S. C.) Union-Herald prints the following: "A writer asserts that within one year 1,700 colored laborers and many whites have left Terrel and Lee Counties, Ga., for the South-west. Texas agents have taken many, offering $20 per month wages, with quarters, land, and rations. The wages offered in Georgia are simply starvation or stealing wages. It is impossible that men should live on them. Six and eight dollars per month for a man for field labor is lower in proportion than the wages of the same grade in China. The writer suggests that when Gov. Smith sends to Europe for laborers, he send the scale of prices with some specimens of the ordinary freedmen's rations—corn bread, hog meat, molasses—and a photograph of the quarters the hands live in."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE EARL OF SHELBURNE.

LIFE OF WILLIAM, EARL OF SHELBURNE, AFTERWARD FIRST MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE. With Extracts from his Papers and Correspondence. By Lord EDMUND FITZMAURICE. 3 vols. London and New-York: MACMILLAN & Co.

The life of the Earl of Shelburne, which Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice has at last completed, is the most timely and valuable of recent contributions to the history of the American Revolution. Lord Shelburne was so prominent an actor in the occurrences of the time, he was so faithful a friend to the struggling Colonies, and exercised so strong an influence in shaping the final issues of the contest, that the record of his career may be regarded as absolutely essential to a full understanding of this momentous period in our history. In a notice of the first of these volumes at the time of its appearance some months ago it was stated that Mr. Bancroft had had the privilege of access to the papers upon which Lord Fitzmaurice has based these memoirs. While the contents of the volumes are, therefore, not entirely fresh to American readers, every student of our history will be quite as grateful for the opportunity of investigating for himself the career of this illustrious statesman, and of searching into the secrets of the political movements in which he bore so prominent a part.

The first volume of these memoirs took us back to the earliest years of its subject, which were spent in the remotest parts of the south of Ireland, under the government of an old grandfather, "who reigned, or rather tyrannized, over his own family and the neighboring country." Until he was 14 years of age his education was absolutely neglected, and at the age of 16, as he himself tells us, in an autobiographical fragment, "I had nobody to teach me and everything to learn, of which I was fully aware; but I had, what I was not at all aware of, everything to unlearn." Sent to Oxford, he made some progress under the direction of a tutor whom he describes as "a narrow-minded man," and upon this, his first introduction to the world, he had the good fortune to meet Lord Granville, Lord Chesterfield, and other persons of distinction, from whom, because they were friends of his father, he received more attention than might otherwise have been given him. In 1757, when he was just 20 years of age, he was an officer in Wolfe's regiment, and was rewarded with the rank of Colonel and that of Aid de Camp to the King, George II., for gallantry at Minden and at Kloster Kempen. Thus brought into intimate connection with the Court, he was bold enough to seize the opportunity, and in spite of the hostility of the Duke of Richmond, and others who were indignant at his rapid promotion, by a single stroke made his political fortune. He became the medium for the negotiations between Fox and Lord Bute which resulted in the overthrow of Pitt. Succeeding to the peerage on the death of his father, Shelburne was shortly after invited by Bute, who had become Prime Minister, to join his administration. He declined to connect his fortunes with those of a leader whom he really distrusted, although he continued to hold the most intimate relations with him. By the political intrigue known as "the pious fraud" Lord Shelburne brought Fox to the support of Bute, and through his agency the consent of the House of Commons was obtained to the peace of 1763. But Shelburne's part in this transaction secured him the lasting enmity of Fox, who charged him with duplicity in having secured his services by misstating the terms which he had made for himself. Lord Edmond's statement of the affair bears the impress of frankness, and does much to modify the harsh judgment which has generally been accepted from contemporary authorities. Bute's next movement was to throw upon others the responsibilities of office while he held on to the actual control. In the reorganization of the Government Shelburne claimed the Secretaryship of State, but he was compelled to be satisfied with the Presidency of the Board of Trade, where he proved so restless and intractable that he was with difficulty retained.

Still another intrigue in which he was a prominent mover resulted in the absolute retirement of Bute. Shelburne at the same time withdrew and sided with Pitt in opposition to the Government on the question of Wilkes' expulsion from the House of Commons. For this act of political independence he was punished by the revocation of his staff appointment, and upon his appearance at court the King absolutely ignored him. Such emphatic disapproval of his course was very naturally followed by Shelburne's temporary retirement from public life. Taking up his residence at Bowood, he devoted himself to the improvement of his estate, to the enjoyment of the society of the distinguished men of letters whom he gathered around him, and to the collection of the manuscripts which are now in the possession of the British Museum, and which have proved so invaluable to the students of American history. In 1765 Lord Shelburne married the daughter of Lord Granville, and her naïve and piquant sketches of the society of which she and her distinguished husband were the centre, as they were set down in her diary, light up most gratefully the earlier part of the severer records of the political plotting and counter-plotting to which these volumes are in the main devoted. She died in 1771, but there is no indication that Lord Shelburne mourned greatly over her loss, unless his starting off on a foreign tour in company with Barré be taken as an indication of his grief. Meanwhile political events of the greatest importance were in progress, and they were taking such a shape that Lord Shelburne's retirement itself contributed to his political advancement. Through Barré, his recognized political mouthpiece, he earnestly opposed the Stamp Act, thus exhibiting a degree of political foresight not possessed by statesmen who were his seniors in age and his superiors in rank. In the course of time his fidelity to the fortunes of Pitt met with the reward which had so long been the object of his ambition, the Secretaryship of State, to which he was appointed under Chatham. But the physical and mental disability which overtook this distinguished statesman caused dissensions in the Cabinet. The policy of coercion against the Colonies was continued, and Shelburne, who was the sole representative of Chatham in the Government, was finally compelled to retire, followed by charges of all sorts of duplicity, and held up to ridicule in the famous caricatures of Gilray. After various changes in the Council and an unsuccessful attempt by the Duke of Grafton to form a Cabinet, Chatham reappeared in public life, and Shelburne came to his support with all his power and ability. But the obstinacy of George III. in rejecting the conciliatory policy advised by Chatham precipitated the Declaration of Independence by the United Provinces, and the war of the Revolution followed. After the downfall of Lord North's Government, the Marquis of Rockingham became Prime Minister, with Shelburne as one of his chief colleagues. From that time Shelburne assumed an increasingly prominent position until, on the resignation of Fox, he accepted the post of First Lord of the Treasury, and thenceforward the negotiations for peace with the Colonies progressed steadily to a conclusion. The prominent part which Lord Shelburne sustained in these transactions is described in detail in these volumes—and the fullest justice is done to the distinguished ability which he developed as a diplomatist by the negotiation of treaties which recognized the independence of the Colonies without making humiliating concessions to the Continental powers. Shelburne's public life after the accomplishment of this result belongs to the political history of Great Britain, and need not be traced here. The offer of a step in the peerage, by which he became Marquis of Lansdowne, did not remove him entirely from active participation in politics, although the closing years of his life were spent in the enjoyment of that retirement at Bowood which had before proved a most effective solace against the malevolent misrepresentation and slander which he seemed to possess a fatal faculty for provoking, and much of which is for the first time fully dispelled by Lord Edmond's candid exposition of the motives which governed his distinguished ancestor in the important transactions with which he was so prominently connected.

This rapid sketch of Lord Shelburne's career indicates imperfectly the great value of these memoirs as a contribution to the political history of this country and of Great Britain. Scattered through the pages of these three volumes there is much lighter material which the superficial reader will glance over with interest. After the death of his first wife, Lord Shelburne, in 1778, became engaged to Miss Molesworth, but that lady "surprised the world" by breaking off the match. "She dined at his house," wrote Miss Elliott to her brother at Berlin, "and sat at the head of the table, and was seen to cry all dinner time. Her aunt, when she came home, asked her what was the matter. She made no answer, but ran up stairs to her own room, and sent Lady Susan a letter to tell her she had found an antipathy to Lord Shelburne and begged she would break off the detested match, which was accordingly done by showing his Lordship the letter. He was angry, as you will believe, to lose £40,000 and so pretty a wife, but put a good face upon it, and said it was proper the ladies should settle those matters." In the following year Lord Shelburne consoled himself by marrying Lady Louisa Fitzpatrick, thus becoming brother-in-law to Richard Fitzpatrick, the wit, and a connection of Charles Fox, whose brother Stephen, Lord Holland, had married Lady Mary, sister of Lady Loulsa Fitzpatrick. The second Lady Shelburne did not follow the example of her predecessor in keeping a diary, but Jeremy Bentham, in his letters from Bowood to his father, partly supplies this deficiency. He speaks of her as the "loveliest of matrons," and her sister, Miss Caroline Vernon, as the loveliest of virgins. "Both of them," he says, "have more than I could wish of reserve, but it is a reserve of modesty rather than of pride. As Providence hath ordered it, they both play on the harpsichord and at chess. I am flattered with the hopes of engaging with them before long either in war or harmony." Later he writes: "I have just been playing billiards with Lady Shelburne. Miss Vernon looked on, but would not play, saying she had never played before. I almost despair of getting them to do the harpsichord. The chess and the billiards were her own proposal; the harpsichord I must beg and pray for." In 1789, Lady Lansdowne died, leaving one son, the Lord Henry Petty. In a letter to Lord Cornwallis announcing the sad event, Lord Lansdowne says: "Though I was taught to expect it long before it happened, I cannot help being excessively stunned by it. I am fighting against the effects of it, as well as I can, by riding and quiet, with a mixture of society which Miss Vernon and Miss Fox, who are so good as to continue the same habits as when Lady Lansdowne was living, are so good as to afford me."

In our notice of the first volume of these memoirs mention was made of Lord Shelburne's attaching Dr. Priestley, the discoverer of oxygen, to his establishment by appointing him Librarian at Bowood. In his memoirs Dr. Priestley tells us that he continued seven years in this relation, spending the Summer with his family at Calne and a great part of the Winter in his Lordship's house in London. "My office," he says, "was nominally that of Librarian, but I had little employment as such besides arranging his books, taking a catalogue of them, and of his manuscripts, which were numerous, and making an index to his collection of private papers. In fact, I was with him as his friend." During his residence with his distinguished patron, Dr. Priestley received £250 per annum, and upon his retirement an annuity of £150, which, he assures us, was punctually paid. During all the time that he was at Bowood his literary activity never ceased. Oratory, orticism, metaphysics, moral philosophy, and theology successively engaged his pen. At the same time he prosecuted the scientific researches which gave him fame. It was while at Calne that he made the discovery of oxygen, although he himself never recognized the full importance of his own discovery in its bearing on the phenomenon of combustion. "Lord Shelburne," he writes, "encouraged me in my philosophical inquiries, and allowed me £40 per annum for expenses of that kind, and was pleased to see me make experiments to entertain his guests, and especially foreigners. The greater part of the time that I spent with him I passed with much satisfaction, his lordship always behaving to me with uniform politeness and his guests with respect."

Dr. Richard Price, the theologian and controversialist, also became a regular habitué of Shelburne House and of Bowood after the death of Lady Shelburne in 1771. He was then 48 years of age. It was not until his fame as an author was established that he attained any reputation as a preacher, nature having denied him most of the physical qualities necessary to success in the pulpit. From theological controversy he branched off gradually into those inquiries on which his reputation depends—financial topics, embracing various aspects of life insurance, the public debt, &c. Morellet, the famous French political economist, was also a frequent visitor at Bowood, where "in the company of Franklin and Garrick and Barré and Priestley, he seems to have found almost an equivalent of the brilliant society he had left on the other side of the Channel. Shelburne often confessed that his connection with Morellet was the turning point of his own career. In his own words, "Morrellet liberalized his ideas."

Malesherbes, the distinguished jurist, was another of those whom Shelburne visited in Paris. Writing of him he says: "I have seen what I had previously considered could not possibly exist, a man absolutely free from fear and hope alike, yet full of life and warmth. Nothing in the world can disturb his repose; he lacks nothing himself, and interests himself actively in everything good. I have never been so profoundly struck by any one in the course of my travels, and I feel sure that if I ever accomplish anything great in what remains of my life I shall do so encouraged by my recollections of M. De Malesherbes."

Mirabeau and Romilly were also among the visitors at Bowood. This story, which Romilly tells of Mirabeau, indicates how untrustworthy "historical" facts may sometimes be: "Mirabeau was fond," he says, "of bitter controversies in conversation with celebrated men. He wrote me a letter while I was on circuit in 1785, in which he gave me a very detailed account of a dispute which he supposed himself to have had with Gibbon, the historian, at Lord Lansdowne's table, in which he expressed himself with so much violence that he seems in some degree to admit that he was to blame. The most extraordinary circumstance, however, is that he never had any such dispute with Gibbon, and that at the time when he supposed it to have taken place Gibbon was actually residing at Lausanne.

The celebrated Dutch physician, Ingenhousz, was another well known figure in Bowood society. Apart from his writings and discoveries, Ingenhousz deserves to be remembered as one of the first scientific men of the day, who devoted his attention to the overthrow of the popular delusions on the subject of health. He is said to have anticipated the saying attributed to an eminent modern statesman that "dirt is matter in a wrong place." A chapter in one of his works is devoted to combating the popular delusion which once held sway among schoolmasters that it was healthful to inhale the air which had passed through the lungs of pupils or others in a crowded room, and that the windows should be closed to facilitate the operation. Shelburne used to say that he always believed Bentham to be the most good-natured man in the world till he made the acquaintance of Ingenhousz. The social charms of the learned physician, however, were not, however, shared by his wife, who seems to have been a modern Xantippe. The fact that they usually lived apart gave the opportunity for perpetrating a hoax upon the long suffering Doctor, for whose benefit one of the guests at Bowood forged a letter announcing that Madame would shortly arrive at the house. The Doctor at once took steps toward leaving it himself, and was only prevented from actually departing by a frank confession on the part of the author of the letter. Ingenhousz was also famous as an operator of inoculation against small-pox, and by some he was believed to have had a right prior to that of Jenner to be called the discoverer of vaccination. Indeed, the story ran that he was the real discoverer, and, entirely careless of fame or unaware of the importance of his own achievement, he communicated it to Jenner without reserving any right. The two Doctors, according to popular report, went to a farm-house near Calne and persuaded a farm servant to allow herself to be vaccinated. The woman used to relate how her friends expected her to have swollen suddenly or to have fallen down dead as a punishment for allowing this strange foreigner to experiment on her. None of these fatal consequences ensued; the farm servants lived to an advanced old age; the experiment succeeded and the efficiency of vaccination was established. To this rather apocryphal story Lord Edmund adds the significant comment Credat Judæus appella. Other distinguished characters of the last century appear in the pages of these notable volumes; but the interest in those who have so long since passed away, as well as in the historical events which are here recorded, is now so remote that these memoirs are not likely to pass beyond the keeping of students or the shelves of libraries.

AUTHORIZED REPORT OF THE THIRD CHURCH CONGRESS IN THE UNITED STATES, held in Boston Nov. 14, 15, 16, and 17, 1876. New-York: T. WHITTAKER. 8vo, pp. 308.

Reports of religious and secular doings are proverbially hard reading. The sparkle of thought and the personality of the man are not always present to the reader. But those congress reports are different in their character from the lumber-room class of literature, and were prepared in the beginning quite as much for the reader as for the hearer. The two reports which have preceded this marked a new venture in the Episcopal Church, the attempt to bring the Church and laity of a naturally conservative religious body into closer and better contact with the thought and life of to-day, and the second report has been said not to suffer by comparison with those annually published by the English Church Congress; but the present report of the Boston Congress is better than the two preceding, because the subjects discussed in the congress were more vital and wide-reaching. In fact, here is to be found discussions of social questions by some of the most thoughtful and competent clergy and laity in this Church. The essays upon "The Prevention and Cure of Drunkenness," with the subsequent speeches, strikes us as meeting the difficult points of this social problem better than much of the ardent speech-making on intemperance, and the same may be said in regard to those upon the "Morals of Politics." If they do not clear up present difficulties in the nation's life, they point out in what spirit we are to meet them, and, what is better, they show a squareness and fairness in stating what men honestly think on political questions which is as refreshing as it is rare. The subject which is treated with the most thoroughness in this report is "The Relation of the Episcopal Church to Freedom of Religious Thought."

Dr. Washburn's essay on this topic is one of those free outbursts of manly thinking which set the reader's mind all aglow with quickened thought, and the speech of a Boston lawyer, Mr. John C. Ropes, on the layman's position and freedom in the Episcopal Church, is an instance of outspokenness, and of truth-speaking, too, which is too seldom known. Indeed, all through this report, you are surprised at the freedom with which important subjects are handled, without running into that wildness of statement which cheapens thought. It is not common to find religious publications in which what does not make for the dominant creed is tolerated, but in this report men write or say what they think, and the short-hand reporter has given every word uttered. The result is a volume which goes much beyond the Episcopal Church, and shows what many of our best minds are thinking upon leading religious and social matters. Other subjects discussed are "The Place of Art in Christianity," "The Relation of our Present Knowledge of Non-Christian Nations, their Morals and Religions, to Foreign Missions," "Secular and Religious Education," "The Adaptation of Episcopal Services to the wants of the People," and "The Connection of Revivals with Christian Nurture." The latter subject seems to be less adequately treated than the others, but as a whole the volume is one of the most suggestive and interesting, in the range of thoughtful discussion, with which we have met for some time. It shows, at any rate, that considerable active thinking went into this Boston Congress, and that, while its members did not change the doctrines or polity of their Church, they contributed very much by these statements of personal convictions toward a better and truer way of looking at secular and religious matters.

WAGES IN THE COUNTRY.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican of the 21st inst. says: "Farmers in the vicinity of Springfield, who hired first-class help last Summer for $18 per month for seven or eight months, are expecting to hire, the coming season, for $15 or $16 per month. The farmers in two or three large dairy towns on the hills, who always have the name of paying more than any others in the State, will probably give an advance on the above figures; but even here the decline in the price of milk and cheese during the past year will necessitate some reduction. The prices for good female help in the country will probably be about $2 per week, or the same as last year. The managers of the Union Relief Association are planning to go quite extensively into the business of furnishing both male and female help for farmers and others living in the country."

KILLED BY A BUNGLING DENTIST.

A telegram from St. Joseph, Mo., 19th inst., to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat says: "On Saturday last a farmer named Johnson, residing near Troy, Kan., visited a doctor in that town for the purpose of having a tooth extracted. The operation was performed, but Johnson's jaw was broken in the attempt. He started for home, anticipating no serious results, but during the night his jaw and neck swelled so much that yesterday morning he choked to death."

O'MAHONY AND FENIANISM.

HONORED IN DEATH, BUT NEGLECTED IN LIFE.

THE "SKIRMISHING" RABBLE TRADING ON THE GOOD NAME OF AN HONEST MAN—THE RECORD OF IRISH PATRIOTISM—CARDINAL CULLEN UNWITTINGLY PLAYS INTO THE HANDS OF THE CHATHAM-STREET GANG.

By the death of John O'Mahony the once noisy and not to be despised Fenian Brotherhood lost the one man whose unsullied name and repute as a scholar and a gentleman gave an air of respectability to the organization. It is true that at the time of his death the organization in this City had dwindled down to about 200 members, and that the so-called "Council" consisted of O'Donovan Rossa and a few needy followers, who, on the death of John O'Mahony, elected him to the distinguished office of "Head Centre" of a body which has not an atom of influence outside the bar rooms in the vicinity of Chatham-square. As a contribution to a history of the latest rise and final collapse of the "liberation movement," the development of a new and highly profitable scheme known as "the skirmishing" plot, together with some account of that scandalous dodge to raise money, THE TIMES devotes a little space. When John O'Mahony organized the Fenian Brotherhood in this country in 1858, there existed a very strong feeling among what may be termed Irish patriots that the time was come to "strike a blow." Many were dissatisfied that the opportunity was lost when England went to war with Russia, and the negotiations which took place between Mitchell, O'Mahony and Doheny, on behalf of their "patriot" countrymen, and the Russian Ambassador at Washington, gave promise at one time of great results; but the sudden termination of the Crimean War put an end to the negotiations. This led O'Mahony to make great efforts to organize, in this country, what was afterward known as the Fenian Brotherhood. That he succeeded in partially accomplishing his aim must be conceded; that he lamentably failed as a leader of men, to say nothing of his childlike incapacity to read character and to judge under-bred wilderness of enterprise one in Cairo. Everything is topsy-turvy. The children read and write from left to right, and even begin to learn their sole lesson-book, the Koran, backward, because the latter chapters are easier and more important. The consequence is that, after a few visits to Arab schools, one cannot help a feeling of surprise when a child sneezes, or shows that he is changing his teeth at the same age as a little European.

One primary school in Cairo is well worth having a peep into. You open a door in the street, and find a room about 10 feet square. It is below the level of the road, and lofty for its size. A grated window, high up, gives a dim light; but a flood of sunshine comes in at the open door, and strikes full on the bright crimson robe of the fakeeh as he sits on his cushion in the corner. At one end stands the only piece of furniture in the room. It looks like a large harmonium done up in brown holland; but turns out to be a box containing the bones of a saint. In front of this curious piece of school furniture squat four-and-twenty little black and brown boys. One or two are disguised as girls, to protect them from the evil eye. All have dirty faces, and several are suffering from ophthalmia. They sit in two rows, facing each other, and simultaneously rock their bodies violently backward and forward as they recite the alphabet, or that verse of the Koran which forms their day's task. The children shout at the top of their little cracked voices in a nasal tone far from musical. The noise they contrive to make is astounding, considering how small they are. If they cease their rocking and shrieking, even for a moment, the master brings down his long palm cane upon their shaven skulls, and they recommence with renewed energy, and an even more violent see-saw. The sentence repeated does not convey the slightest meaning to their minds, nor is any attempt made to explain it. Two or three older children are sitting beside the fakeeh, getting lessons in the formation of the Arabic characters. Their copy-book is a piece of bright tin, and they use a reed pen called a kalam. The ink-bottle is a box containing a sponge saturated with some brown fluid. A long row of tiny slippers, of every form and color, lie neatly arranged at the door; for the place where the bones of a saint are enshrined is holy ground, and no one may soil the clean matting of the floor with outside defilement. No register is kept of the pupils, or of their days of attendance. Indeed, although the fakeeh can repeat the whole of the Koran off book, it is highly probable he would find some difficulty in counting up to the number of his scholars. His acquirements begin and end with a textual knowledge of the sacred book, and unfortunately the wishes of his pupils' parents with regard to the education of their children are bounded by the same narrow limits. The schoolmasters are miserably paid, mostly in kind, for piastres are scarce, but they exercise considerable influence, and no marriage or family fête is complete without their presence. In better class Arab schools a little mathematic is sometimes taught, but not always. Boys who wish to pursue that branch of their education generally learn from the public cabâni, a man whose business it is to weigh merchandise. A child whose father keeps a shop is taught by assisting in it. Geography is also neglected, which is fortunate, as nothing can be more ludicrous than the attempts which are sometimes attempted. The teaching is, of course, entirely based upon the Koran, which upholds Mr. Hampden's views with regard to the shape of the earth. The children learn that it takes 500 years of traveling to get round the mighty plain, while perhaps a few yards from the school door Mr. Cook's agent is advertising a trip to do the whole business in 90 days. It must be a little hard to explain all about the seven earths and the seven heavens, and the seven climates and the seven seas of light. The one important fact which the children retain is that Mecca is the centre of the earth. At present each boy comes to the master with his lesson, says it, and returns to his seat. He is succeeded by another, and so on during the whole day. This would be impossible if more than reading and writing were taught. Of the mosque schools the ancient El Azhar is still the most important. It provides instruction, such as it is, for more than 11,000 pupils. A considerable number are housed and fed within its hospitable walls. The scholars are of all ages, and come from the most remote provinces as well as the larger towns. They may stay as long as they like and go there when they please. If they are really clever they are taken by professors, who are paid entirely by voluntary donations; if they are very poor, they receive help from their Alma Mater in the shape of food. The baksheesh of 500 sheep sent one day by the Viceroy on the occasion of a family rejoicing was therefore not unacceptable. The school is, in fact, a great free national university for the teaching of the theology of the Koran. There are few rules; there is no compulsory course of study; there is no small-call or classification of students. Curiously enough, coffee and tobacco are forbidden within the walls; but, no doubt, the students rich enough to have rooms outside make up for the deprivation by an extra allowance at home. Some of the Coptic schools are well worth a visit. The principal one in Cairo is exceedingly well attended. The boys look as if their intelligence was cultivated, and many of them read and speak either French or English with ease and a good accent. They seem to have a great interest in each other, and to feel a genuine pride in seeing their companions show off their small accomplishments to strangers. The Copts take some pains to teach their girls, and have two fairly well managed schools at Cairo. The children are taught reading, writing, arithmetic, singing, and needlework.

WANTED MORE VARIETY.

Connecticut papers are telling a story of a Stratford old lady who had never been on the cars before, and who recently rode by rail to New-Haven. On her return being asked what she thought of it she exclaimed: "Why, 'taint nothin' at all! It's the most monotonous thing imaginable! Why, I believe, coming back they went through the identical places they did when they went down!"

A QUAKER THEFT.

The Albany Journal of Wednesday evening has the following account of a curious charge made against one James Spooner before Justice Clute, of that city, on Tuesday: "Although classified under the head of petit larceny, it is certainly worthy of special mention. Spooner resides on Clinton avenue above Quail street, and is either employed at or frequents the West Albany cattle yards. It is charged by Prosper L. Eastman, a well-known dealer, that Spooner has been guilty of stealing the hair from the tails of several head of cattle belonging to the complainant, and disposing of it by the pound. According to the charge, it appears he cut what is sometimes termed the brush from the tails of fifty cattle and upward, and disposed of the same. In the cutting, however, there was no mutilation of the tail itself, only the clipping of the bunch of hair at its terminus. Spooner was held by Justice Clute to answer."

HIGHWAY DAMAGES IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The Boston Advertiser of the 21st inst. says: "Many of the towns of Massachusetts, through their Selectmen and other officers, have united in a petition to the Legislature for the repeal or modification of the laws making towns liable for damages on account of defects in their highways. Under this liability it is claimed that the towns, however careful of their roads, are always exposed to vexatious and unjust suits, making expensive litigation necessary in any event, and often, through the inexperience of the juries, leading to excessive and burdensome damages. One or the great trials of town officers, and especially of those who endeavor to do their official work with the same fidelity and judgment which they give to their private affairs, is to be made defendants in suits at law for injuries which is was not in the power of human foresight to guard against, and to take the risk of adverse verdicts which they know are oppressive and unjust. There are certain risks in ordinary travel which no reasonable expenditure on the highways can entirely overcome; and in the interest of the people, already taxed to the extent of their ability to pay, it is claimed that the traveler himself should be made to take a larger share of them. The grievance is more seriously felt, because it has been brought home to several towns whose roads are in exceptionally good condition, and whose officers have exhausted all reasonable precautions to secure the safety of public travel."

CRUELTY TO A NURSE.

HORRIBLE TREATMENT OF A YOUNG WOMAN BY A GENTLEMAN FARMER AND HIS WIFE—PINCHED, POUNDED, AND OTHERWISE SHAMEFULLY ABUSED.

From the London Telegraph, Feb. 8.

Yesterday, at the Slough Petty Sessions, before Mr. Tompson, in the chair, Major Gaskell, Mr. Watson, and Rev. H. H. Way, Robertson Francis Morris, aged 27, described as a gentleman farmer, residing at Iver Heath, Bucks, and Janet, his wife, aged about 30, were charged with unlawfully wounding Caroline Carter, a nurse recently in their employment. The complainant, who was said to be suffering from the alleged ill-treatment she had received, was conveyed in a fly from the Slough Union to the Police Court, which was crowded, the extraordinary nature of the case having created considerable excitement in the district. Mr. C. F. Gill defended the prisoners, who, on taking their place, in the dock with their child, were hissed by the spectators. Mrs. Morris was very fashionably attired in a black velvet cloak, hat and feathers.

Caroline Carter seated in a chair, and supported by pillows, gave her evidence while almost in a fainting condition. She said she entered the prisoner's service at the end of May; Mr. Morris lived at Iver Heath, whither she went from Princess Louise's Home at Wanstead, Essex; Mrs. Morris comenced pinching her on the second day after she went there, and had since persecuted her; about a month ago she broke a poker over her back; she used to hit her with the poker, which used to bend, and then it broke; she hit her five or six times up in the nursery; sometimes the baby used to cry at night, and Mrs. Morris said it was her fault; the female prisoner also hit her because the baby left his stool, and had since struck her with the poker; the husband was not present when Mrs. Morris struck her, but as she cried and screamed he came up to see what was the matter; the poker was six inches longer before it was broken on her back; she threatened witness that if the child cried at night she would give her [witness] a thrashing in the morning; witness did not complain to the husband; Mr. Morris had not ill-used her before that; Mrs. Morris had pinched and beaten her daily; she had been horsewhipped by Mr. Morris after he came home from church; in the morning she played with the child up stairs to make it happy, but it began to cry, and the boy Walter Thrift came up about 11.30; Thrift acted as cook, and she gave him some Christmas cards for his sister; then she told the mother of this—that she had given Thrift some cards; when they came home she was in the garden with the child, but went up stairs to the nursery to take his things off; Mr. Morris in the afternoon came up with a horsewhip into the nursery, Mrs. Morris having gone out with the child into the garden that it should not hear her; Mrs. Morris saw the horsewhip in her master's hand; he told complainant to go across the table, but she refused to do it; he then took hold of her arm, got her across a chair, and hit her with the horsewhip over the back, but she could not say how many times; she tried to get away, but Mr. Morris had shut the door, and he pulled up her clothes and hit her across the legs with the whip; that was while she was standing behind the door; the table was split up the middle when he wanted her to lie across it; it was a little table, and when he tried to bend her down across it was split in the middle; the woman was not in the room at all while he was striking her with the whip; complainant cried while he was thrashing her; he hit her once or twice on the legs while her clothes were up; the whip was a horsewhip belonging to the boy Thrift, and Mr. Morris hit her with the stick and handle of the cartwhip with which the boy used to drive the cart-horse; Mrs. Morris then came up and locked her in, so that complainant could not get out; she did not get her dinner till 8 o'clock at night, when Mrs. Morris brought it; she had a piece of cold meat and two or three potatoes; she had some dry bread in the morning, and nothing to drink, unless she had some water; she was never allowed downstairs in the kitchen, and when they went out the boy used to fasten the door, so that she could not get in; Mrs. Morris had also hit her once with the whip while getting some coal up; she had not much strength, and Mrs. Morris said she was waiting for some one, and hit her with the whip; Mr. Morris used to kick her, and had done so more than once since the horsewhipping; but witness could not remember how many times; he had kicked her on the side; Mrs. Morris used to run a dinner-fork into her, and make her arm blue; her arms were all over scars; one morning her arm was all over blood, which ran down her sleeve; that was done with the scissors, because the child had been crying; Mrs. Morris ran the scissors into her more than a dozen times one morning; that was the worst time, and took place after Christmas; last Sunday she ran away; the reason witness' hair was so short was because Mrs. Morris had pulled her out with both hands; after she had ill-used her in the day witness was so upset that she did not know what she was doing; she had to keep the fire alight in the nursery all night, and the female prisoner used to come in to see that she did so; if she was not up, Mrs. Morris used to pull her out of bed by the hair of her head; once or twice she had had a fit; at this point stimulants had to be administered to the complainant by a medical man who was in attendance.] Mrs. Morris used to push her in the back with a stick; did it more than once; it was a stick used to rake the fire, so that the noise of the poker should not wake the child; one morning Mrs. Morris touched her with a dinner-knife, and said she would run her through with it, and would ram the poker down her throat if she screamed so; she was then hitting her on the back with the poker because the child cried in the night; witness showed the bruises made by Mrs. Morris when she punched her to the old housekeeper; sometimes there would be a piece pinched out, she used to pinch her so hard; little pieces of skin used to come from the arms; the old housekeeper was there two months after she went there in May; Mary Munch, the housekeeper, had been in the prisoners' service before; witness used to show her the punches and bruises; she had a father, but did not know where he was; she had eight sisters and brothers, but did not know where they lived; she had no mother; she used to write to Miss Thompson, the lady who got her into the orphanage, once a quarter; they were expected to do that; she was at school, she had not written since she had been with the prisoners; witness went to Mrs. Piggott about July, and asked her to write a letter to the Matron; she showed her the bruises on her arms, and Mrs. Piggott did write; complainant put the letter in her drawer till she could get a penny to buy a postage stamp; Mrs. Morris went to her drawer, turned the things out and found the letter; the prisoner read it and put it back, so complainant tore it up.

[The complainant here fainted, and the case had to be stopped for a time.]

Mr. Talbot, Secretary of the Princess Louise Home, informed the Bench that he could give the entire history of the poor girl, and, if it pleased God that she should recover, she would be taken back to the home. He hoped the magistrates would adjourn the case in order that their solicitor might be instructed in this matter. He had a letter from the mistress a fortnight ago, saying she was in good health. The complainant having been removed from the court to recover, the Chairman announced that the Bench had decided to adjourn the examination until next week. The prisoners were then removed to the cells at the back of the court, and as they left the room were again hissed. Mr. Gill, on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Morris, asked that they might be allowed to find bail, an application which the Bench promised to consider.

SCANDINAVIANS GOING TO CALIFORNIA.

The San Francisco Alta of the 14th inst. says: "According to reliable information, a large emigration from Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, is turning toward this coast. Hitherto the overflow of this sturdy, industrious, and hardworking people has sought an outlet in the northern part of the Mississippi Basin, where large and flourishing colonies of Scandinavians are located, but some hard years in that portion of our country have diverted their attention to the Golden State, where better inducements are offered. From such places where these people already are located in California, we have the most favorable report of their industrious and frugal habits, and we welcome their brethren to our State, and hope that they will there find all the inducements to remain and help work up our resources. As far as we have ascertained, the emigrants intend to form colonies in the southern part of the State."

THE COST OF LOSING A FRIEND'S MONEY.

The Rochester Express of Wednesday says: "In the County Court Tuesday, the suit of Henry H. Goff against Charles Keeler was tried, Mr. Goff is a resident of Spencerport, and he and Keeler were formerly intimate friends. Goff, therefore, some time ago, gave Keeler a check for $250, which he asked him to cash for him while on a visit to this city, and Keeler did so, but on the way home lost the money, he claims; he could not tell how. Keeler declined to make good the $250 to Goff, on the ground that he was not a common carrier, and because he cashed the check merely as an accommodation to Mr. Goff. After hearing all the evidence, the jury returned a verdict in favor of Mr. Goff to the amount of $263 62, being the principal sum and interest."

DIPHTHERIA.

The Boston Traveller of Monday says: "Diphtheria is prevailing to an alarming extent in Auburndale. The family of Capt. John M. Griswold has been sadly afflicted the past few days. On Friday, Joseph R., the oldest boy, aged 9 years, died, and was buried on Sunday, and soon after their return from the funeral, the next boy, Charles, aged 5 years, died, and a little girl is now very low with the same. Mrs. Griswold is also quite sick, and is not able to be about. Mr. Griswold is a brother of Mr. Charles Griswold, of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New-York, for whom the above boy was named. Mr. Griswold has the sympathy of the entire village in this sad bereavement."

CHURCHES AND MINISTERS

HOME AND FOREIGN EVENTS.

Rev. Dr. J. L. M. Curry, a prominent Baptist divine of Richmond, Va., has applied to have his political disabilities removed.

The Pope has recently addressed letters to the Republics of Paraguay and Chili expressing his gratification at their constancy to the Church.

The Southern Convocation of the Episcopal Diocese of Iowa has adopted unanimously, resolutions favoring the division of the diocese into three bishoprics.

The Emperor of Germany has written a very devout letter to Old Catholic Bishop Rheinkens, who had sent him congratulations on the completion of his seventieth year.

Bishop Marvin, of the Southern Methodist Church, who is making a tour of the world, met with a warm fraternal greeting from the Northern Methodist missionaries in Japan.

The Old Catholics of Germany, Austria, and Switzerland publish 10 denominational newspapers, the chief of which is the Deutscher Merkur, of Munich, edited by Prof. J. A. Messmer.

The Reformed Episcopal now has more than half as many churches in Chicago as the Protestant Episcopal Church. It has 10 congregations, four of which have been recently organized.

Rev. Dr. Broadus, of South Carolina, the most prominent Baptist clergyman of the South, has delivered a series of five lectures on "Preaching" at the Baptist Theological Seminary at Rochester.

At the meeting of the Methodist Book Committee, in this City last week, Rev. J. C. Hartzell was elected editor of the South-western Advocate at New-Orleans, in place of ex-Senator Revels, resigned.

The Central Baptist deplores the weak standing of the Baptist denommation in St. Louis, where it has only 1,600 white members. It credits New-York City with 13,865 Baptists; Philadelphia with 15,000.

It is not lawful for a Scotchman to use bad words even about the Pope. A Scotch Presbyterian Magistrate recently fined an Irish Orangeman $10 for saying: "To —— with the old man," meaning Pius IX.

The Lutherans have several very flourishing churches in this City. St. Matthew's reports 1,620 communicants, and St. Luke's 2,257. The whole number of Lutheran members on the Island is estimated to be 5,000 or 6,000.

Up to Feb. 15 the Episcopalians had raised $20,000 of the $75,000 necessary to liquidate the debt of their Missionary Boards. The Methodists, who had a missionary debt of over $200,000, are making large collections to meet it.

There is a conflict in the Tyrol between the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Salzburg and his suffragan, the Bishop of Brixen. The former authorizes the participation of ecclesiastics in school committees and the latter forbids it.

Protestants are so scarce in Flanders that the establishment of a Protestant community in a small manufacturing town is heralded as a very important event. The priests threw the usual obstructions in the way of the organization of the Protestant Church.

The Secretary of the Baptist Home Mission Society informs his denomination that $80,000 is required before the 1st of April to make the receipts of the year equal the expenditures. The Society employs 175 missionaries and supports seven schools for freedmen.

The Lutheran Augustana Swedish Synod has an Eastern Conference, embracing all the States east of Ohio. This conference includes 22 organized congregations, and 40 or 50 preaching places. One of the congregations is to be found in this City and another in Brooklyn.

The China Inland Mission is an undenominational organization formed in 1865. It has embraces members of all denominations in England, and its object is to carry the Gospel into every province in China. It has fifty-eight missionaries and seventy-five native helpers.

The Baptists are calling for $100,000 for their Theological Seminary at Chicago. The seminary is threatened with the foreclosure of a mortgage, and the amount named is necessary to help it out of its difficulty. The Sunday-schools of the North-west are appealed to give their collections for one month toward this object.

It is not strange that after the intervention of the Queen for the release of Rev. Mr. Tooth, who has been in prison for violating the Public Worship act, that a motion should be brought for the repeal of the act. The imprisonment of Mr. Tooth and the interference of his sovereign in his behalf have been turned to good account by the Ritualistic Party.

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

THE RIVAL STOCK BOARDS.

A NEW DEPARTURE BY THE STOCK EXCHANGE—A DEPARTMENT FOR DEALING IN GOLD, GOVERNMENT BONDS, AND MISCELLANEOUS SECURITIES.

The Governing Committee of the Stock Exchange held a meeting yesterday afternoon that did not conclude until dark. The subjects under discussion were of great importance, and the action taken was the result of several weeks' deliberation by sub-committees and by the Governing Committee themselves. When it was learned that the new Open Board were negotiating for the rooms of the Gold Board, whose lease expires May 1, the Governing Committee at once leased the building over their heads for three years, from May 1, at the exorbitant rate of $20,000 per annum. The new Board then secured the premises No. 16 and 18 Broad-street, and the old exchange had an elephant on their hands. A sub-committee was appointed to devise some method of making use of the Gold building, and they had numerous conferences with members of that Board who had not affiliated with the seceders, as a result of which they prepared the following report, and at the meeting last evening it was formally adopted:

"The committee appointed to utilize the property recently leased by the Stock Exchange, would report progress, and recommend that in the room now occupied by the Gold Board there shall be established a department of the Stock Exchange for dealing in gold, Government bonds, exchange and miscellaneous securities, and that such solvent members of the present Gold Board as shall pass a joint committee composed of four members of the Gold Board and three members of the Stock Exchange, be admitted to this department for three years from the 1st of May next, at an annual charge of $50 each, payable in advance, on condition that the persons so admitted shall agree to conform to the laws of the Stock Exchange in regard to joining other organizations, and such other regulations as may be necessary for the proper government of this department. It is understood and agreed that no additional admissions shall be made to this room other than members of the Stock Exchange and the present members of the Gold Board, as hereinbefore provided, and that the subsequent insolvency of any persons so admitted from the Gold Board shall cause a forfeiture of these privileges. A majority of the committee are also in favor of an amendment to the Constitution providing that such members of this new department as shall purchase memberships in the Stock Exchange during this period of three years shall have the usual initiation fee remitted. All of which is respectfully submitted."

On motion it was also resolved to amend the Constitution so that after May 1 members of the Stock Exchange will not be allowed to attend any Gold Board excepting the new department created in the Stock Exchange. The second business in order was the question of commissions, rendered vital by the low rates established by the new Open Board. Four propositions were offered and were partly discussed at a previous meeting of the committee. The one that found most favor was that of Mr. Dickerman, and this was finally adopted, as follows:

"Commission shall be charged under all circumstances, both upon the purchase and sale of stocks, bonds, and other securities, excepting gold and Government bonds, either for members of the exchange or for other parties, and the rates shall be upon the par value thereof, as follows: One-quarter of 1 per cent. when the transaction is made for a regular investor, one-eighth of 1 per cent. when the transaction is made for any party not a member of this exchange; except bankers, brokers, or active dealers, to whom the minimum rate shall be one-sixteenth of 1 per cent. No business shall be done at less than this latter rate for any persons or firms not members of this exchange, nor for any banking or other institution. The minimum rate to members of the exchange shall be one-thirty-second of 1 per cent., except where one member merely buys or sells for another, (and does not receive or deliver the stock,) in which case the rate shall not be less than one-fiftieth of 1 per cent."

This acts as a substitute for Article XVIII. of the constitution, except that the clause relating to the enforcement of penalties for violation of the Commission law are retained. But to provide against accidents, an additional amendment was subsequently tacked on that: "The Governing Committee may in its discretion suspend the enforcement of the penalties named in the foregoing section." The committee then adjourned.

THE OPEN BOARD OF STOCK-BROKERS.

The New-York Open Board of Stock-brokers held another meeting in Delmonico's, New-street, yesterday afternoon. Mr. John F. Underhill, for the Executive Committee, reported that the building of the old Open Board, Nos. 16 and 18 Broad-street, had been secured as a permanent operating room, and that a temporary room had been leased on the first floor of No. 21 New-street, from March 1 until May 1, at a monthly rental of $1,000, with the privilege of remaining after the latter date, if necessary, until the completion of the refitting of the permanent structure, at the annual rental to be paid by the present lessee—$3,200 per annum. The committee had not decided when to commence business, but everything was ready for Monday next, though the members would be obliged to put up with some temporary inconveniences if they decided to begin so quickly. For himself he was opposed to any delay. They were all heart and soul in the movement and they had the support of the men who give the business to the New-York Stock Exchange—business which had been driven away by the pernicious action of that exchange during the past four years. He therefore moved that the business of the new exchange commence on to-morrow morning at 9:30 o'clock. [Great applause.] The motion was put and carried unanimously amid great enthusiasm. Mr. Underhill then went on to say that telegraph instruments would be in working order in the new exchange in time for business, so that prices of stocks and all information would be instantly furnished to the members and to all those who have instruments at present in their offices. [Cries of "Good! Good!" and loud applause.] Furthermore, the Executive Committee had decided that until further notice transactions in the new exchange shall be confined to securities dealt in by the New-York Stock Exchange, with the addition of Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, and Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company stocks, both of which companies will shortly establish transfer offices in this City. [Applause.] It was announced that up to date 151 members had signed the constitution, and that a large number of others have until March 1 to do so. Members' and customers' tickets will be ready at No. 21 New-street on Monday morning. The meeting then adjourned.

ANOTHER NEW CABLE PROJECTED.

It was rumored on the street yesterday that the Direct Cable Company had decided not to reduce their rates below 30 cents, gold, a word. Mr. Oliphant, Superintendent of the company, said to a TIMES reporter that there is not a word of truth in this report. He had received no news of a reduction to 25 cents, but was expecting it. He thought, however, that this low rate would not last very long, as it would be ruinous. He then volunteered the following information: A new cable company, under the title of the Union Cable Company, has been formed in Canada, with a view to uniting a point on the Nova Scotian coast with a point on the coast of Ireland, and, as an auxiliary to the scheme, to lay a cable from Quebec down the Gulf of St. Lawrence, thus enabling ships to communicate, thereby probably preventing great loss of life. It is expected that the Canadian Government will favor this scheme, and, should it succeed, efforts will be made to unite the Direct Cable Company with the new company. Mr. Fortin, a sort of Canadian Pimmel, is the projector.

In regard to the scheme for laying a cable between Baltimore and Belgium, now before Congress, Mr. Oliphant pronounced it worthless and impracticable for the following reasons: It will require 5,000 miles of cable, and no existing ship is capable of carrying that quantity. If it be decided to lay it in two sections, the engineers are the only point available for stopping place, and the Portuguese Government will not grant the necessary privilege on the conditions laid down by Mr. Fish, viz., that it shall open its shores free to Americans. The charter limits the rates to one shilling per word, and this cannot be made to pay. The water through which it will have to pass is twice as deep as that above the present cables, and the cost of laying will consequently be very much more expensive; but at the same rate as the present cables cost the expenditure required will be not under $12,000,000. It could not be operated. The amount of electricity required to force a word 5,000 miles would melt the wires. Finally, the charter prevents the company from amalgamating with any other company, and it would thus suffer under all the disadvantages of a single wire, which is liable to break at any moment, which is the present condition of the Direct Cable Company. Mr. Oliphant regretted to be obliged to come to these conclusions, as the more cables there were the better it would be for his company, and the better for the public, on account of the competition.

PAYING FOR THE STATUE OF LIBERTY.

The Committee on Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, of which Mr. William M. Evarts is chairman, have been awaiting the action of Congress in regard to granting a site. One house having already passed the bill, and the probability of its early passage in the other being good, the committee will give to the public during the coming week the plan which they have decided upon to raise funds for building the pedestal and for receiving and inaugurating the statue. The amount needed has been calculated at $150,000, and the subscription is to be made a national affair. All citizens of the United States are to be invited to contribute 25 cents each, though larger contributions will not be rejected. Committees have already been formed in Boston and other large cities to receive money toward the fund, and the preparations for the final inauguration of the statue are to be pushed forward as rapidly as possible.

THE CONTINENTAL LIFE'S TROUBLES

THE DE WITT REFERENCE RESUMED—THE COMPANY'S OUTSTANDING RISKS—MR. WILLIAM R. GRACE, THE RECEIVER, MAKES A DETAILED STATEMENT OF THE ASSETS—A LARGE NUMBER OF NOTES AND DRAFTS AMONG THEM.

The hearing in the matter of the Attorney General against the Continental Life Insurance Company, in which Mr. Abram V. De Witt was appointed Referee to take proofs, was resumed yesterday at the office of Mr. John L. Hill, No. 20 Nassau-street. The original purpose of this reference was to show that the former Receiver of the company, Mr. John J. Anderson, was appointed by collusion and fraud, and also to prove the insolvency of the company, it having been generally understood that an effort would be made to resuscitate it. The presentation to the court, however, of Mr. Anderson's report showing the insolvent condition of the Continental, and his subsequent resignation, made it unnecessary to take further proof touching his appointment, and Attorney General Fairchild now seeks to contest the validity of the action in which both Mr. Anderson and his successor, Mr William R. Grace, were appointed. This will only necessitate the hearing of testimony relating to the company's condition, and another meeting will doubtless conclude the reference. As soon as the report of Referee De Witt is made to the court the Attorney General will move for the dissolution of the corporation and the appointment of a new Receiver, and that the proceedings in the suit of John O. Hoyt be declared null and void. As has been heretofore published in THE TIMES, this motion will be based on the ground that a stockholder has no right to move for the dissolution of a company except through the Attorney General.

The first witness called yesterday was Mr. Seth C. Chandler, Jr., the Actuary of the company, who was examined by Attorney General Fairchild, and testified that he made an estimate to show the amount of the outstanding risks of the company and the reserve necessary to reinsure them; there were at the time of the company's failure 19,754 policies in force insuring $38,834,213; the amount of the reserve on these risks, computed according to the American Experience Table of Mortality, with 4½ per cent. interest was $5,365,614; besides the above there were matured claims outstanding to $50,350; there were also $1,203,027 of loans against those policies, which would reduce the liabilities to that extent; witness further testified regarding the death claims against the company, amounting in the aggregate to $435,060 78.

Mr. William R. Grace, the Receiver, was then called and questioned by Mr. Fairchild regarding the assets of the company. He testified that he received from Mr. Anderson about $161,500 in cash, or its equivalent; bonds and mortgages the face value of which was about $1,031,000; the building occupied by the company, estimated by Mr. Anderson to be worth $400,000, and other assets the actual value of which could not at present be determined, as follows: Ten water bonds of the City of Yonkers, $10,000; 45 shares of the Continental Life Insurance Company's stock; three bonds and a trust deed of W. E. Pickett, of Chicago, the face value of which was not given; 36 shares Atlantic certificates; a note signed by W. R. Blake for $10,645, with 45 shares of Continental stock as security for the same; another note given by the same person—same amount and same security; a note given by J. H. Rissenburgh for $11,500, with 15 shares of Continental stock; 10 shares in the name of G. W. Smith; 25 in the name of R. C. Frost; 825 in the name of Luther W. Frost, with blank transfers attached; 170 shares in the name of G. Hilton Scribner; a note given by William C. Whitney for $33,500, which amount was secured by 335 shares of the Metropolitan Steam-ship Company's stock; another note for $2,500, dated March 7, 1873, also given by Mr. Whitney, with 30 shares of Continental stock as security. Mr. Grace then read from the inventory of assets the following list of securities which were given by the Loaners' Bank to the company, to secure its deposit of $43,000. These were as follows: Fifteen hundred shares of the Continental Railway and Trust Company's stock; two second mortgage bonds of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company; 200 shares of the stock of the Grand Central Bank of New-York, $25 each transferred in blank; 80 shares of stock of the Citizens' Gas-light Company of Long Island, $50 each; 400 shares of the stock of the Citizens' Steam Railway Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., $100 each; 11 7 per cent. coupon bonds of the Adirondack Company, and two due bills of Thomas C. Durant for $2,562 each. The other assets comprised four and one-half shares Louisville Chemical Works' stock; a mortgage on the personal property of Bernard Messer, value not given, and other papers relating to the same, and a first mortgage bond of the Fredericksburg and Gordon Railroad Company, face value $1,000. Besides these there were papers relating to mortgages, and about 800 shares of the stock of the Empire Mutual Life Insurance Company, (reinsured in the Continental), the face value of which is about $80,000. Among the bills receivable there were $1,840 in checks and notes, and drafts amounting in the aggregate to nearly $45,000; among these were nine drafts drawn by Luther W. Frost on the New-Jersey Mutual Life Insurance Company, amounting to $19,591 44; there were also a number of protested checks and notes, which were of no value whatever.

The Attorney General asked the Receiver if he could give an approximate estimate of the total value of the assets, and he replied that he could not.

Mr. L. V. Styles, the Cashier of the company, was then placed on the stand, and testified that the note given by Mr. William C. Whitney for $33,500, dated March 7, 1873, was paid on Dec. 31 of that year, and was credited to him on the books of the company; the other note was also partly paid. When Mr. Styles had concluded, the hearing was adjourned until March 5.

A THIEF MAKES RESTITUTION.

FIVE SILK CLOAKS RETURNED—TIRED OF LEADING THE LIFE OF A THIEF—A SINGULAR LETTER.

Early last evening a messenger handed to Capt. Copeland, at the Central Office, a dispatch addressed to Detectives Ferris and Von Gerichten. The dispatch was handed to Detective Ferris, who, on opening the envelope, found it to contain a note saying: "Call at the district telegraph office, No. 685 Broadway, and you will find a present waiting." The note bore no signature. Detectives Ferris and Von Gerichten at once proceeded to the office named, and were there informed by the operator in charge that a young man had left a parcel for them at the office. The parcel was found to contain five elegant silk cloaks and a letter addressed to the detectives, which read as follows:

NEW-YORK, Feb. 24, 1877.

Detectives Ferris and Von Gerichten:

I send you these cloaks so that you can make a clean job of it. When you meet me give me a part of the $500 reward. "Chris" and me were the only men in the job; that was the first dry-goods "crib" I ever "cracked," and it will be the last. I have been over 30 years a thief, and I am a poor man to-day. Sergt. James Kealy, Detectives King and Lyons, could tell you how I spent five years in prison, for what another man done. I am 56 years of age. I spent fourteen months and six years in prison, so I think it is time to begin another business, so I bid good by to all your comrades, and the last in Ninth-street. Tell Superintendent I am going to live "on the square," he arrested me twenty-five years ago for "stage-buzzing." WILLIAM H. CLINCHNER.

The cloaks were recognized as a portion of the property stolen on the 4th inst. from the store of Hahn, Benjamin & Co., No. 315 Broadway, on which occasion over $3,000 worth of goods were carried off. The rest of the property has already been recovered by the detectives. "Chris" referred to in the above letter is the man James Wilson, otherwise known as "Dutch Chris," who was arrested by Ferris and Von Gerichten, and who is now in the Tombs awaiting trial for the burglary. The "lady in Ninth-street" referred to is the housekeeper of the tenement-house No. 416 East Ninth-street, where the goods were found in a room hired by the burglars for the purpose of secreting the plunder. The detectives do not know who the man signing himself "Clinchner" is, but an investigation is on foot to establish his identity.

THE KELSEY OUTRAGE.

William H. Wickham, District Attorney of Suffolk County, accompanied by ex-Congressman Reeves, called upon Gov. Robinson on Monday last, and had a consultation in regard to offering a reward and pledge of immunity to whoever shall come forward with testimony to convict the parties concerned in the Kelsey outrage. Gov. Robinson said he had no authority to offer any reward, unless the money should be first appropriated by the Legislature, and he agreed with Mr. Wickham, that it would be against public policy to make a general offer of immunity. In regard to the reward of $3,000 offered by Gov. Dix, if there was no limitation or time specified, the offer was still in existence, and the money would have to be paid in case a claim to it should be established. In addition to the above reward, there was also one of $1,000 offered by the Suffolk Board of Supervisors, which is also still valid.

A VALUABLE LIBRARY AT AUCTION.

On Wednesday and Thursday, Feb. 28 and March 1, at 4 P. M., Messrs. Bangs & Co. will sell at public auction, at their sales rooms, No. 656 Broadway, a large and choice collection of American and English books. The catalogue contains 710 different works, some of them consisting of many volumes. In the list there is a great variety of the best editions, for the most part superbly bound, among which are the histories of Bancroft, Prescott, Motley, Niebuhr, Strickland, and Robertson, valuable dictionaries and cyclopedias, illuminated Psalter, Brann's Cities of the World (1573), Aldines Elzevirs, Tasso with Morghen's plates, Mezeray's France, Newgate Calendar, Renneville's Bastile, scarce American pamphlets, and some works on theology.

TWO CHILDREN FATALLY BURNED.

A PANIC IN A TENEMENT-HOUSE—A FIRE CAUSED BY A MOTHER'S CARELESSNESS.

Yesterday morning Mrs. Brown, a colored woman, residing on the top floor of the three-story brick tenement-house, No. 137 Wooster-street, lighted a wood fire in the stove in her apartments, and after clearing up the room, swept a quantity of waste paper and rags under the stove. She then went out to a neighboring grocery store to purchase provisions for her breakfast, leaving her two children, Hattie, aged 3 years, and Joseph, aged 15 months, lying on the bed, which was in close proximity to the stove. The woman had been gone but a few moments when the neighbors became alarmed by screams which came from the room, and rushing up stairs, saw smoke issuing from the apartments. The cry of "fire" brought to the scene several policemen from the Eighth Precinct Station-house near by, and the officers, rushing through the blinding smoke, discovered that the paper and rubbish under the stove had ignited, and the flames had communicated to the bed on which the children were lying. The mattress and bed-clothes were all in a blaze, and the poor children literally surrounded by the flames, were uttering the most heartrending cries. Patrolmen Miller and Johnson took the children in their arms, and, enveloping them in their overcoats, extinguished their burning night-clothes, and carried them to the Prince-street Police Station. Mrs. Brown, who had returned to her home only to find the place on fire, followed the officers to the station-house, weeping piteously. Police Surgeon Cook was summoned to attend the suffering children, and found that they had been fatally burned. Their clothing was consumed to ashes, and their bodies presented a most horrible appearance, the flesh in many places being reduced to cinders. The unfortunate little ones were sent to the Chambers-street Hospital and tenderly cared for.

Meanwhile the Police and firemen had thrown the burning mattress and blankets out of the window and extinguished the fire in the room, but the flames had crept between the lath and plaster walls and were soon bursting out through the roof. Owing to an accident to Engine No. 13, which was the first steamer to arrive, a delay occurred, during which the flames gained rapid headway, Hole being drawn close up to a hydrant the wheels of the heavy steamer slid down a snow-bank and the apparatus brought up across the railroad track in such a position that no connection with the hydrant could be made, and it was therefore practically useless for the time. In a few minutes Engine No. 3 arrived and a stream of water brought to bear on the burning building quickly extinguished the flames. The fire caused a panic among the numerous occupants of the house, and the Police had considerable difficulty in allaying the excitement.

The loss of Mrs. Brown on furniture, &c., will not exceed $50. The loss to the other tenants is estimated at $200, and the building, which is owned by Mrs. Walters, of Union Hill, N. J., was damaged to the amount of $300.

CONDITION OF CITY HOSPITALS.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE VISITING COMMITTEE—THE REFORMS INSTITUTED WITHIN THE PAST FIVE YEARS.

The Fifth Annual Report of the Visiting Committee for Bellevue and other Hospitals has just been published and presented to the State Charities Aid Association. The objects of the committee are twofold: First, to visit the hospitals, with a view to the mental, moral, and physical improvement of the inmates; secondly, to bring about such reforms in the hospitals as may be practicable. The first of these objects cannot be formulated in a report, but it is believed that the humanizing effect upon the inmates "is of no small value in keeping alive that sense of common interests and mutual brotherhood, which is an antidote to the poison of pauperism." As to the second object, the committee say that, "although certain abuses have ceased, and the hospitals are in many respects greatly improved, still the system from which the abuses sprung remains the same." The committee indicate that the evil effects of the "system" is due to political influence in making hospital appointments. They say: "If the Commissioners themselves were appointed irrespective of political opinions, and removed only for cause, they would be free to establish that system of administration which their experience should prove to be for the best interests of the people under their charge. They would then be able to train a body of subordinates, chosen with reference to their fitness, who, knowing that they were appointed during good behavior, would be ambitious to do their best; and thus in a few years we should have our public charities administered wisely and justly." It is recommended that a lying-in hospital on a small scale be established within the City limits, the maternity wards in the Charity Hospital being at times greatly overcrowded. The estimate of the expense for the support in a lying-in hospital of this nature is placed at $4,500, and it is thought that a suitable building for the purpose could be rented for $1,250. In conclusion, the report says: "When the visitors recall the disorder, profanity, drunkenness, immorality which met them on every side five years ago; when they remember the vermin and filth, the indifference to suffering, and the absence of Christian influences in the hospitals, they acknowledge with heartfelt gratification that these abuses exist no more; vicious people no longer parade their vices; intemperance is repressed; order and cleanliness, though not yet attained, are regarded as desirable, and a spirit of emulation among the different institutions has been aroused, which is a healthy indication for the future. The following ladies compose the Executive Committee: Mrs. Joseph Hodson, Mrs. Lydig M. Hoyt, Miss Rosalie Butler, Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, Mrs. E. L. Youmans, Mrs. Marlborough Churchill, Mrs. William Farrar Smith, Mrs. Henry Y. Leavitt, Mrs. Joseph Knapp, Miss Wisner.

THE INTERNATIONAL RIFLE MATCH.

PREPARING FOR THE CONTEST FOR THE CENTENNIAL TROPHY NEXT FALL—THE FOREIGN RIFLE TEAMS TO BE INFORMED THAT THE MATCH WILL TAKE PLACE IN SEPTEMBER.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Rifle Association was held yesterday afternoon, Judge N. P. Stanton in the chair. A sub-committee, consisting of Major Gen. John B. Woodward, Judge H. A. Gildersleeve, and Col. G. W. Wingate, was appointed to draft conditions for an inter-State rifle match for the coming year. This match will not conflict with the military inter-State match, the conditions of which will be the same as last year. The following resolution was offered, and, if it should meet with the approval of the American team, will be adopted at a subsequent meeting:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to notify the foreign teams participating in the recent international long-range rifle match for the championship of the world, and also the Scotch, Australian, and Canadian Rifle Associations and the National Rifle Association of Great Britain, that the next match for the Centennial trophy will take place at Creedmoor in September next; open to the riflemen of all countries on the same conditions as those governing the former match; provided that notice be received by the National Rifle Association on or before May 1, 1877, from any foreign rifle association, or the riflemen of any country, that a team will be sent to represent them on the same terms as the former match; that, in case no such notice be received by that date, such match shall be postponed to the same date and place in 1878, the trophy, in the meantime, to remain in possession of the American team as at present; that in case such notices be received the riflemen of the United States shall be invited to participate in a series of competitions for the purpose of selecting a team and reserves to represent America in such a match.

A letter was received by Mr. Schermerhorn, Secretary of the National Rifle Association, yesterday, from Major A. B. Leech, Captain of the Irish Rifle Team, in which he says that the council of the Irish Rifle Association has passed a resolution to the effect that as the Centennial trophy had been shot under specified rules, that body could "see no reason for making any alteration in them, but would suggest that in future the range selected should be a neutral one." Major Leech further said that as rifle shooting at this season of the year was "in abeyance," he could not say whether it would be possible to raise a team to shoot for the trophy this season or not.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE FANCHER.

A Broad-street lawyer named Thomas M. Tyng has preferred three charges to the Governor of malfeasance in office against Judge Enoch L. Fancher, of the Court of Arbitration of the Chamber of Commerce. They are: Causing the Clerk to enter in his minutes cases that have never come before the court, in order to magnify its usefulness; causing the Clerk to make false returns to the State Treasurer, and to present false sworn statements of these returns, and causing to be entered upon the record of the court in an action pending in the Superior Court between Tyng and Luther R. Marsh and others, a decision totally different from that actually made by himself as Referee. On behalf of Judge Fancher these allegations are pronounced wholly unfounded, and Mr. Tyng's action is ascribed to revenge at having been defeated in a case in which he was one of the parties before the Court of Arbitration.

THE PALETTE CLUB REUNION.

The Palette Club gave its fourth informal reunion last evening at the Club house No. 7 East Twenty-second-street, on the occasion of the opening of the new rooms, consisting of a suite of spacious, elegantly furnished reading and dining rooms, and the largest bowling alley in the City. In the large art hall one of the finest collections of American pictures was exhibited. The literary and musical programme was varied and very entertaining, consisting of recitations by Messrs. W. F. Ormsby, F. Hopkinson, Charles Roberts, Jr., and S. S. Dunham. Cornet by Mr. M. Arbuckle, violin by Mr. M. Carri, piano by Messrs. C. Weihert, and F. Tully, singing by Mr H. Millard. After a supper the company adjourned.

THE FUNERAL OF KATY REIDEL.

INTERMENT OF THE REMAINS IN WOODLAWN CEMETERY, STATEN ISLAND—THE GRIEF-STRICKEN MOTHER AT THE GRAVE.

The last act of the tragedy in which Katy Reidel was the central figure was performed yesterday, when her remains were consigned to a grave in the German Woodland Cemetery, at Silver Lake, Staten Island. The arrangements for the funeral were somewhat defective, and hence the interment did not take place until very late in the afternoon. The parents of the dead girl arrived on the Island early in the morning, and were forced to wait for hours in the cemetery for the arrival of her body there. The undertaker expected them to come to the Poor-house to see the body, and delayed the funeral, and then, believing that Mr. and Mrs. Reidel had returned home, he determined to inter the body without instructions from them. The hearse was followed from the Poor-house to the cemetery by a carriage and two light wagons. The cortége reached its destination about 5 o'clock, where Mr. and Mrs. Reidel, two Germans, who had taken an interest in the case, and the keeper of the cemetery, with his wife and daughter, met it. The grief of Mrs. Reidel found expression in sobs, and muttered imprecations against Weldspiel, whom she persisted in calling the murderer of her child. The father of the dead girl said nothing, but his whole frame shook as he strove to suppress his agony. The coffin was taken from the hearse by the reporters, who also acted as pall-bearers, and bore it to the grave. The burial-place was in a bleak spot near to the paling which incloses the cemetery. The walk from the hearse to the grave was mournful, indeed. Following the reporters bearing the coffin were Mr. and Mrs. Reidel, Keeper McCormack, of the Poor-house; Mr. Dempsey, the undertaker, the keeper of the cemetery, with his wife and daughter, and the two Germans before mentioned. At the grave the coffin was opened, and the parents of the dead girl were allowed to look upon the face of their child for the last time. As soon as the lid was off, and the countenance of the corpse was exposed, Mrs. Reidel's grief passed all bounds. She looked upon her dead child, and wrung her hands. Her body was convulsed, and then she gave vent to incoherent expressions and invocations of divine vengeance against Weldspiel. "Oh Katy, my child!" she cried. "You have had all of gold and silver now. This is the last! Weldspiel! Weldspiel! He did offer you fine presents! Oh, God! do not forget him! On my poor Katy, you were so pretty four years ago; now you are gone from me; you have left your poor mother. Good-bye, my Katy, good-bye." She passionately kissed the forehead of the dead girl, and was then drawn away from the coffin. When it was lowered into the grave she ran forward as if to throw herself into the pit. She was caught and held back. After a moment she stooped down, and taking up a handful of mold, threw it upon the top of the coffin and uttered a prayer. This was the only benediction given to the dead. As the earth was being placed upon the coffin-top, she again cried, "Oh, Weldspiel, you will have to come to this, too. You must die like my Katy. What good are your presents now? All the gold and silver in the world is good for nothing to you now, my poor child! Good-by, Katy, good-by, good-bye." She was then led to the house of the keeper of the cemetery, where the good little German woman strove to comfort her, telling her she would keep the grave of Katy green and blossoming with flowers.

A STORM OF WIND AND RAIN.

EFFECT OF THE GALE IN THIS CITY—CELLARS AND DOCKS SUBMERGED AND A BOAT-HOUSE LIFTED FROM ITS POSITION—NO SERIOUS DAMAGE SUSTAINED.

Yesterday's storm was a very severe one. It commenced to rain at 12:20 A. M., turning to snow at 3:15 A. M., and again to rain at 10:45. With the exception of several short intervals the rain and snow continued all day. During the night and early morning it was accompanied by a furious gale of wind from the north-east, with a velocity at this point of between 30 and 40 miles per hour. It attained its highest degree of speed at 8:45 A. M., when it blew at the rate of 43 miles per hour. The barometer ranged as follows: Midnight, 29.0 75; morning, 29.0 50; noon, 29.0 46; 1:30 P. M., 29.0 45; 4:47 P. M., 29.0 47; afterward stationary. The amount of rain-fall up to 4 P. M. yesterday, when the last measurement was taken, was .77 of an inch. The extent of storm was unusually large. Threatening weather was reported throughout the State, also in Michigan, Massachusetts, Ohio, Minnesota, Indiana, Illinois, Connecticut, Maine, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Kansas, Kentucky, Iowa, Florida, Virginia, Maryland, Alabama, Cherokee Nation, District of Columbia, Canada, and Nova Scotia. It was snowing in the morning in Baltimore, Chicago, Indianapolis, Milwaukee, and New-London, and raining in Philadelphia and Pittsburg. During the day the snow ceased at Baltimore and Philadelphia and turned to rain in New-London. It commenced snowing in Cincinnati, Boston, Portland, Erie, and Buffalo. But nowhere was there anything like the gale that prevailed in this City, and especially to the south-east of it. The wires having all been blown down along the coast, no intelligence was received here up to a late hour in regard to the possible damage to shipping, except that the Amerique was carried by the heavy sea on top of the beach, and that her present position is, doubtless, much worse than previously. At the Coast Wrecking Company's offices, however, it was said that she has suffered no damage and can readily be got off.

The damage along the wharves, so far as known, was slight. Some cellars on the North River side were submerged, but no serious loss occurred. Early yesterday morning the chimney of the three-story brick tenement-house, No. 849 Ninth-avenue, was blown down. The falling bricks crushed through the roof, and the débris fell with great force on the bed in which Mrs. Mary Howard was sleeping. She received a fracture of the left leg below the knee, and of the left hand. She was cared for at Ninety-ninth Street Hospital. A large sign was blown down at No. 490 Broadway, breaking a number of windows in the front of the building. A large tree was blown down in Madison-square at 3 A. M.

The gale was very strong at Harlem and Morrisania, and on the East River near the entrance to the Sound. About 9 o'clock the water, which was very rough, reached to within about two feet of the road-bed of the railroad bridge at Fourth-avenue, and the spray sprinkled the cars as they passed over, but no damage was done to the bridge. Just above the bridge are the boat-houses of the New-York and the Columbia Clubs, and between it and the Harlem Bridge, at Third-avenue, are those of the Gramercy, Atalanta, Stock Exchange, Nassau, Athletic, Union, Harlem, Dauntless, Nautilus, and Herald Clubs. The Gramercy Club house, which is a handsome structure, surmounted by a fanciful dome, was lifted by the tide above the piles which surrounded it, and became impaled on a portion of them as the tide subsided. As it is not likely that the tide will soon rise sufficiently to float the house, its extrication from its novel elevation will be difficult. The weather-boards of some of the other club-houses were badly strained and damaged, the bridges connecting them with the shore submerged, and, in a few instances, the floats from which the boats are entered were carried to the tops of the piles, to which they were tied, and left high and dry there when the tide receded. The tide rose to the flooring of the Morrisania steam-boat dock, and some of the other docks on that side of the river, and on the Harlem side, were submerged. A few basements on the East River side of Harlem, and several shanties in sunken lots near the shore in that vicinity were flooded, and the sea-walls around Ward's and Randall's Islands were for some time under water, but in no instance, so far as could be ascertained, was any serious damage sustained.

The damage caused by the wind storm in Brooklyn was confined to the breakage of some 30 panes of plate-glass in store windows, and the blowing down of some signs and fences.

THE STORM IN NEW-JERSEY.

The gale swept over the eastern section of New-Jersey. Two schooners, which had been anchored in Newark Bay, were driven ashore on the Island of Black Tom, just off the Communipaw shore, and it was feared that they would go to pieces. A two-story frame dwelling-house, in Greenville, occupied by Dennis McDermott, was blown over, just after the family had left it from fear of such a catastrophe. Several window panes were blown in on Newark-avenue, Jersey City, and a gust of wind broke the doors of the Jersey City Opera-house, on Montgomery-street. In all parts of Jersey City and Newark signs were blown down and trees stripped of their branches. The rain and sleet which followed have, as usual, swamped the Hoboken Meadows.

POSITION OF THE STEAMER AMERIQUE.

The steamer Amérique, which has been ashore some time at Seabright, N. J., is in a less favorable position than she was before the storm. She has moved about 300 yards south, and 70 feet higher up on the beach. The rudder-post and rudder have been broken off. The wreckers and most of the crew have been obliged to go ashore, as they are unable to work while the sea is so heavy.

WASHINGTON.

THE SUCCESSION TO THE PRESIDENCY.

FIELD'S UNCONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSITION—THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION IN THE CASE—THE MODE STILL OPEN IN THE EVENT OF FAILURE OF THE COUNT—MR. CONKLING AND THE FIELD BILL.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—The bill proposed by David Dudley Field, providing for filling the Presidential office after the 4th of March, in case no election is declared under the Electoral bill, is clearly unconstitutional. The provision of the Constitution which applies to the subject is as follows: "And Congress may, by law, provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President." This provision has no reference to a vacancy occurring in the office of President by a failure to elect. Unfortunately, the clause is without the words, "or otherwise," found in the Oregon statute, and, therefore, the only vacancies that Congress can provide for are those enumerated. Judge Hoadley claimed in the Oregon case that the words "or otherwise" gave no power to fill a vacancy caused by a failure to elect, because certain specific causes of vacancy were named, and only those occurring in like manner were intended. Without those two words, "or otherwise," it is quite clear there is no power in Congress to do what Field proposes. If 12 o'clock of Sunday next arrives without the announcement of an election, there will be no President of the United States, unless the contingency is provided for, as suggested a day or two since, by the resignation of President Grant. The dispatch referring to that proposition was incorrect, so far as it stated that Vice President Ferry would hold over beyond the limit of President Grant's term if he assumed the duties of the office by reason of President Grant's resignation. Mr. Ferry's present term of office as Senator expires at noon of March 4, and he cannot continue as President of the Senate beyond that time without a new election to the office. But this difficulty is easily arranged by re-electing, in place of Mr. Ferry, a President of the Senate, one of those Senators whose term does not expire with this Congress. Mr. Morton, for instance, if chosen President of the Senate next Sunday morning, would continue in that office without a new election until the end of his Senatorial term, and if he should take the duties of the Presidential office by reason of President Grant's resignation he would hold over until after the new election.

David Dudley Field, in his new bill, proposes that the President of the Senate shall act as President, which is a wide departure from his previous proposals, and it is the common report that the Democratic obstructionists have the insane notion that they can elect Mr. Conkling to succeed Mr. Ferry. It is not suggested by any one that Mr. Conkling himself is cognizant of such a scheme. It is quite clear that the Republicans hold the key of power in any event. Successful filibustering would give to the Democrats for President either Mr. Hayes, who would be declared elected by finishing the count in the Senate, on Mr. Morton, probably, who would occupy the office as President of the Senate, or President Grant perhaps, who, if anxious to grasp power, as the Democrats have always pretended, has an easy opportunity to continue himself in the office if they should force a vacancy, for which the Constitution provides no remedy.

PRESIDENT HAYES' CABINET.

SENATOR SHERMAN OFFERED THE POSITION OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY—NO OTHER APPOINTMENTS YET DECIDED UPON—GOV. HAYES EXPECTED IN WASHINGTON ON THURSDAY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—The strictest secrecy has been observed in regard to the purposes and the results of Senator Sherman's visit to Ohio, but one important fact has been learned in a manner which warrants its being stated positively, and it is that Gov. Hayes offered Mr. Sherman the position of Secretary of the Treasury in the new Cabinet. There was, of course, a consultation between the Governor and the Senator, concerning the other Cabinet appointments and the policy of the Administration, but of this it can only be said that no other appointment to the Cabinet has been fully decided by Gov. Hayes. Senator Sherman has not accepted or declined, but holds the subject under consideration. Gov. Hayes is expected to arrive here on Thursday next, and will be the guest of Senator Sherman until, with his family, he takes possession of the White House.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—Many Southern Republicans are urging the appointment of Senator Alcorn as a member of the Cabinet of President Hayes, should that gentleman succeed to the Presidency, on the ground that such an appointment would be entirely satisfactory to the South, and that it would aid in enabling the Republicans to regain control of Mississippi and other Southern States.

NO MORE OF TILDEN.

VIEWS OF A DEMOCRATIC PAPER IN WASHINGTON—A SABBATH DAY'S SENSATION FOR THE DEMOCRACY—AN IGNOMINIOUS EXPERIENCE RECORDED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—The Sunday Herald, one of the oldest and best of the Sunday papers in Washington, which has supported Tilden since his nomination at St. Louis until the present time with ability and earnestness, has caused a sensation in Democratic circles to-day by an editorial headed, "No More of Tilden in Ours." The article claims that Mr. Tilden was elected and has been fraudulently deprived of the office, but it proposes to stand by the result of the Electoral bill. Referring to a suggestion that Tilden will be the Democratic candidate in 1880, it says: "So far from assenting to the claim that Mr. Tilden is entitled to another nomination at the hands of his party, we charge that to his nomination, and to the party management which it involved, or which was submitted to at his dictation, is chiefly due our present disaster." The article goes on to charge that Tilden's nomination was attained by disreputable means and the use of money, which was paid to well-known Washington lobbyists, who were sent months before the holding of the Convention to work up his interest in the State capitals. It says: "A political intriguer of the old régime occupied rooms during the last session at a fashionable hotel here, and headed the Tilden clique at the national capital." It denounces the idea involved in the promises of the Tilden crowd to defray the expenses of the campaign, a pledge which it charges was broken, and it claims that more money would have been raised by private subscriptions for a poor but popular candidate. Some space is devoted to the management of the New-York people since the election, and the article concludes in the following words: "And after such an ignominious and disastrous experience as this, we are asked to train under Tilden in 1880."

NO MORE FILIBUSTERING.

THE SCHEMES OF THE REVOLUTIONISTS ATTENDED WITH TROUBLE—SPEAKER RANDALL OPPOSED TO FILIBUSTERING—A CHANCE TO HAVE THE COUNT CONCLUDED ON TUESDAY AFTERNOON—FUTURE RECESSES TO BE OPPOSED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—Pursuit of information concerning the filibusters and their schemes has this evening been attended with a good deal of trouble from the fact that the lunatic element has been suppressed to such an extent that their crazy and wicked conspiracy is broken up, and they have made no progress since yesterday. Whether they will forego all further attempts to delay, or whether, for the sake of consistency, they will continue such resistance as is possible, nobody can tell; but that they cannot accomplish their purpose of defeating the count is said to be by them conceded. As long as they had the Speaker with them they had hope, but since he has deserted them they see that they must be defeated. Without any intention to examine into Mr. Randall's motives for changing his course, the fact, which is undoubted, is that he found he was playing into the hands of his personal and political enemies in the House, who were making use of his actions during the past few days to secure his defeat as Speaker during the next Congress. Randall has now set himself right and saved his re-election if a Democrat is to be chosen Speaker. He is so committed against filibustering that he may be depended upon to do what devolves upon him as Speaker to put a stop to it.

While it seems almost certain that the revolutionists have been beaten and acknowledge their defeat, there still remains some anxiety, which will not be entirely allayed until the vote of Wisconsin has been counted for Hayes and Wheeler and their election is officially declared. The general expectation of everybody here will be disappointed if the States of Pennsylvania and Rhode Island are not counted early to-morrow and the certificates from South Carolina sent to the Commission during the afternoon. The action of the Commission will doubtless be very quickly determined, as the only objection which can be made by the Democrats to counting the vote of the Hayes Electors is nothing more than a silly technicality which, if sustained, would render an election in South Carolina henceforth and forever impossible. There is no occasion whatever for argument in the case, and while the rules of the Commission would allow eight hours to be wasted, a change will probably be made so as to confine speeches to the limit of an hour or two on each side, and there is no reason why the report of the Commission should not be made to the House on Tuesday. When that report is made, it can be objected to and debated two hours, but there is no other reasonable cause for delay, and the count should be completed Tuesday or Wednesday. If the filibustering element carry out their threats of separating the houses on every Republican State, there will remain only Rhode Island and Wisconsin, after South Carolina is disposed of, to which they can make objections. At the latest, therefore, the count should be concluded, and the result declared on Thursday afternoon. It is possible—though the suggestion is doubtless too sanguine—that the efforts at delay will be discontinued when the fact of defeat to their purpose is made certain, and in that case we may have the conclusion of the Electoral count on Tuesday afternoon.

When the Electoral vote has been counted down to South Carolina, and the certificates from that State have been sent to the Commission, another legislative session of the House will be held. The last six days of the session having been reached, propositions to suspend the rules, which must be voted upon without debate, will be at any time in order. It is probable that there will be offered in the House a resolution that hereafter when the two houses are separated to consider objections made to the vote of any State, in joint convention, the House shall proceed to act upon such objections in accordance with the law and without taking any recesses whatever until the questions have been decided and the result of the election has been announced. It will require a two-thirds vote to pass this resolution, but it is believed, from the developments of yesterday and to-day, that the proposition will succeed.

It is announced that as soon as the opportunity is presented, Mr. Springer will introduce a resolution in the house recognizing the Nicholls government in Louisiana, and the Hampton Government in South Carolina. His idea is that the Republicans will vote against this resolution, and in consequence the Democrats who have heretofore been opposed to filibustering will immediately join the ranks of David Dudley Field & Co. The pretense is altogether too shallow, and the attempt is too late for it to succeed. It is also understood that Field will introduce his bill for a new election as soon as the House meets after the South Carolina case is sent to the Commission, and he expects to take up the session of Tuesday with discussing and acting upon it. He supposes the bill will pass and seems to have an expectation that some Democratic votes will be gained to the filibustering crowd by reason of such action. It will be observed from these facts how active and persistent is the attempt to defeat an election. It is stated, however, on what seems to be good authority to-night, that 20 Democrats who heretofore voted with the Field party will to-morrow vote against further delay.

MR. HOAR'S RETORT UPON HEWITT.

QUOTING DANIEL WEBSTER AT HIM—ALL THE SCREWS LOOSE—DEPLORABLE EFFECTS OF GREAT RESPONSIBILITIES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—Mr. Hoar, in the House yesterday, in replying to Mr. Hewitt's unfounded charge that he had deceived the Democrats by talking one way in the joint committee and acting another way on the Commission, after fully disproving the allegation, closed his speech with the following happy hit, which brought Hewitt into ridicule on both sides of the house by reason of its complete characterization: "Mr. Speaker, a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts being charged, as I have been, with dishonor in the performance of a public duty, said: 'We have a maxim in New-England, when certain men make exhibitions of themselves, that in the mind of such a man there is a screw loose somewhere. In this man's mind all screws are loose.'" [Laughter and applause.] "I am quoting Mr. Webster about Mr. Ingersoll, you understand. 'The whole machinery,' said Mr. Webster, 'is rickety, shaky, crazy, out of joint;' and I have sometimes thought I have seen instances of gentlemen whom great responsibilities have brought into like condition of mind." [Laughter.]

DEFALCATION OF A POSTMASTER.

GEN. M'ARTHUR, OF CHICAGO, A DEFAULTER TO THE GOVERNMENT—A SPECIAL AGENT PLACED IN CHARGE OF THE OFFICE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—The Postmaster at Chicago, Gen. John McArthur, has been found to be a defaulter to the Government in some amount which is not known, or at least is not stated. A special agent has been placed in charge of the office, with directions to turn it over to the bondsman of Gen. McArthur to administer until a new Postmaster is appointed. It is understood that Gen. McArthur was engaged in extensive private business which was unsuccessful, and he probably diverted public funds in an attempt to save his business from ruin. He has gone into voluntary bankruptcy, and made the Government a preferred creditor, and it is reported from Chicago that there will probably be no loss to the United States.

GEN. M'ARTHUR FILES A VOLUNTARY PETITION IN BANKRUPTCY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CHICAGO, Feb. 25.—Postmaster John McArthur, of this city, is reported to be a defaulter to the Government to the amount of $38,000. On Saturday he filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, making the United States the preferred creditor, and immediately afterward forwarded his resignation to Washington, asking that some person be placed in charge of the office. On Friday he called a meeting of his bondsmen, notified them of his deficiency, and asked that they help him out of his difficulty. This they refused to do until the matter had been brought officially into court. Special Agent Stewart, of the Post Office Department, has been here some days investigating the affairs of the office, and will have charge until Gen. McArthur's successor is appointed. McArthur says he has used the money for the purpose of carrying on his private business—that of an iron foundry. He has filled the Chicago office about five years.

VIEWS OF PRESIDENT GRANT.

NO INTENTION TO RESIGN—LOUISIANA AND SOUTH CAROLINA LEFT TO HIS SUCCESSOR—CHANGE OF VIEWS AS TO EMPLOYING TROOPS IN THE STATES—THE PRESIDENTIAL QUESTION—HIS ADMINISTRATION SATISFACTORY.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—President Grant, to-day, remarked to the agent of the Associated Press, in the course of conversation, that but little remained for him to do previous to the expiration of his term on Saturday next, when he and his family would leave the Executive mansion and temporarily reside with Secretary Fish. They will visit their home in the West in April. The time for their contemplated departure for the West Indies and Europe is uncertain. The President, when the agent entered his office, was assorting and binding such papers as he intended to retain, while fragments of others were profusely scattered on the floor. Two ancient looking Indian medals—one of copper and the other of silver—seemed to be valued by him very highly. The silver one bore the bust of Washington in slight relief, and on the opposite side was a representation of clasped hands. This medal had descended from the days of Washington to the chief who two years ago presented it to the President as a mark of profound respect, and in gratitude for his peace policy. The President in return presented the chief with a silver medal bearing his own likeness. The President remarked that he had been some days in examining his private papers, but was happy to say he had just completed this work and now anxiously awaited the close of his administration. He desired to have at least one year's rest or recreation.

In response to a question as to what he would do should no declaration be made of a President, he replied that it rested entirely with Congress, but he thought that such a declaration would be reached, as those who yesterday sought unnecessarily to postpone the count met with a very decisive rebuke in the House. It would be quite proper, however, for Congress to pass a law amendatory of the act of 1792, designating what person (the presiding officer of the Senate, for instance,) shall act as President until a new election be ordered, in case there should, owing to factious opposition, be no declaration of President and Vice President based on the Electoral count. The agent said: "It has been asserted, Mr. President, that an arrangement was in progress by which, in the possible contingency above named, you would resign your office, thus permitting the presiding officer of the Senate to fill the vacancy thus occasioned." The President replied, with a smile: "So I hear, but the only knowledge I have of such an arrangement is from the newspapers."

The Agent—Something has been said about your ordering more troops to Washington.

The President—Such is not my present intention; but if they were needed I should order them here. I think, however, that everything will be peaceful, as there are no indications of disturbances in connection with the Electoral count or the declaration that may be made.

The Agent—It has been published that you have distinctly said you would not formally recognize one of the two Governments in Louisiana and South Carolina?

The President—It is true, as I think it would be improper for me to fix a Southern policy for my successor and thus embarrass him. If I were to recognize the Republican Governors they would have to be sustained by military force, and I think the entire people are tired of the military being employed to sustain a State Government. If a Republican State Government cannot sustain itself, then it will have to give way. If a remedy is required, let Congress, and not the President, provide it.

The Agent—Much unfriendly comment has been made on the executive order prohibiting a military demonstration in Charleston, S. C., on Washington's Birthday. If you have no objection, it would be interesting to learn the reason for your action in the premises.

The President—My proclamation heretofore issued commanding all illegal or unauthorized armed associations to disband, is still in force. The men who were going to parade were nothing but armed political bands. They have never respected the proclamation, and only seemingly disbanded. I must say that while I believe the Democratic leaders would have done all that was possible to prevent an outbreak, yet on an occasion of that kind men sometimes indulge too much in strong drink, and while under its influence might so express themselves against their political opponents as possibly to provoke retaliation and thus incite a riot, with serious if not fatal consequences, and which disturbance might extend to other localities. Therefore, entirely apart from the propriety of observing the day, it was thought better that the military demonstration should be prevented for the reason stated rather than run the risk of a riot.

The Agent—I have seen it stated that Gov. Hayes will arrive here on Thursday for consultation with his friends. I presume, therefore, that you have some information on the subject.

The President—I have no idea that he will start for Washington until the result of the Electoral count is declared.

The Agent—Mr. President, are you well acquainted with Gov. Hayes?

The President—I cannot say very intimately, but I had frequent occasion to see him when he was a member of Congress, and he called just as others did.

The Agent—You have had a number of grave public questions before you during your terms of service, some of which, of a diplomatic character, have been peacefully settled. I hope nothing has occurred to occasion your regret concerning them.

The President—I am satisfied that they will bear examination, and there is but little, if anything, of which I complain considering that before I was elected to the Presidency I never had a political training or a desire to occupy a political position.

The conversation then turned on the measures of the Administration, both foreign and domestic, and it seemed to be a pleasing reflection to the President that now, on the eve of his retirement from office, the United States are at peace with all the world; the treaty of Washington, by which the so-called Alabama claims were satisfied, and the settlement of all disputes with Spain culminating in an extradition treaty, being the two most prominent features of diplomacy. The President, however, thought that the financial policy of the Administration was equally successful. He expressed some regret that there would not be time for Congress to act on his recent recommendation, which would facilitate the resumption of specie payments and bring gold and currency on a par, and the balance of trade being so much in our favor, gold would accumulate in the hands of the people as money instead of being a marketable commodity.

There having been rumors that the President intended to send a valedictory message to Congress, it can be stated on the authority of the President himself that he has no such intention.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS.

THEIR PRESENT CONDITION—FOUR BILLS IN THE HANDS OF A COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE—PROPOSED REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—The following is the condition of the general appropriation bills: The Invalid Pension bill has become a law. The Consular and Diplomatic bill has passed both Houses, and awaits the President's signature. The Navy, the Deficiency, the Legislative, the Indian, the Fortifications, the Post Office, and the Military Academy bills, are in conference, and, therefore, in a way of early passage. The Sundry Civil Expenses bill is pending in the House for consultation. The River and Harbor Bill has been reported to the House and recommitted, and the Army Appropriation bill was reported yesterday. The latter bill provides that no money shall be appropriated for recruiting the Army beyond the number of 17 000 enlisted men, and limits the pay of the General of the Army to $11,000; of the Lieutenant General to $9,000, and of a Major General to $7,000 per annum. None of the money appropriated by the act is to be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over that portion of any railroad which was constructed by the aid of a land grant on the condition that such railroad should be a public highway for the use of the United States Government. The number of Cavalry regiments is reduced to eight, Artillery regiments to four, and Infantry regiments to 16. Cavalry companies may be recruited to 100, and a sufficient force of Cavalry shall be employed in the defense of the Mexican and Indian frontier of Texas.

Considering the present condition of the Electoral count and the pressure of other business, it does not seem probable in the view of a number of members that this bill can pass the House, but others are of opinion that the House may, by narrowing the limit of debate, pass it in time to be considered by the Senate, provided the Electoral count shall be concluded early this week. It is not believed, however, that the Senate will pass it in its present shape. All the other appropriation bills, owing to their state of forwardness, can be passed with comparatively little delay, but as the short remainder of the session will be so largely occupied by proceedings connected with the Electoral law, there is a very general belief that some of the appropriation bills cannot possibly obtain final action, and that there will therefore be a called session of Congress.

THE LOUISIANA GOVERNMENT.

COLLECTION OF THE TAXES—VIEWS OF GOV. PACKARD—WARRANTS ISSUED BY PACKARD ADVANCING.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—The Republican Governor (Packard) of Louisiana telegraphs United States Marshal Pitkin, who is now here, as follows:

"Nicholl's dispatch to Burke relative to tax collections in Louisiana merits no confidence. Nicholl's tax collectors can neither collect taxes nor get local recognition as such collectors. The assessment-rolls for the collectable taxes this year are all in the hands of the holding over Tax Collectors appointed by Kellogg, and all these officials recognize the Government of which Packard is the legally constituted head. Nicholl's men cannot obtain possession of a single tax-roll in the State. The Nicholl's organ, New-Orleans Democrat, of the 22d inst., complains that Packard warrants are so rapidly advancing in rates."

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—The forty-fourth anniversary of the Congressional Temperance Society was held this evening at the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church. Senator Ferry made the opening remarks, and Rev. Dr. Chickering read a statement of the condition of the society. Addresses were delivered by J. N. Stearns and Rev. Dr. Patton, of New-Haven, Conn., the latter of whom is now in his 79th year. There was a large attendance.

The Court of Claims will assemble to-morrow, with a full bench, Judge Peck having returned to this city from Chicago, after an absence of four years on account of ill-health. During Judge Peck's absence many of the cases before the Court of Claims have failed of a decision, owing to an equal division of the remaining four Judges.

The near approach of the new Presidential term has already attracted a large number of visitors from all parts of the country to the capital, and according to present indications there will be as many strangers here as on any previous 4th of March.

Representative Lord, of New-York, who was detained by sickness and death in his family, has returned to Washington. He is opposed to any dilatory action in regard to the Electoral count.

The Electoral Commission were in session yesterday at noon, but, there being no business before it, took a recess until 3 o'clock, at which time a further recess was taken until 4 o'clock, which was again extended until 5 P. M., when the Commission adjourned until Monday at 10 o'clock A. M.

Secretary Morrill is now able to sit up and see his friends, and will probably be able to attend to his official duties as usual in a few days.

Lewis Payne, of Hudson, Columbia County, has been nominated for United States Marshal for the Southern District of New-York.

George W. Julian, of Indiana, has arrived here, and will argue the Democratic side of the South Carolina case before the Electoral Commission.

The Union (newspaper) of this city, of which Hon. Montgomery Blair is editor, will publish a double-leaded editorial to-morrow morning favoring opposition to further proceedings under the Electoral act, and calling for a new election.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT.

MOVEMENTS OF THE NEXT CHIEF MAGISTRATE.

GOV. HAYES' PREPARATIONS TO SET OUT FOR WASHINGTON—RESIGNATION OF THE GOVERNORSHIP PROBABLE ON TUESDAY—THE ROUTE AND HIS TRAVELING COMPANIONS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

COLUMBUS, Feb. 25.—Gov. Hayes left Columbus yesterday for his home in Fremont, to look after some private business requiring his attention before his departure for Washington. He will return to-morrow evening, and will probably resign his office as Governor of Ohio on Tuesday, and leave here for Washington on Thursday. He will be accompanied by a delegation representing a majority of the Legislature, now in session here, together with many prominent Republicans from Cincinnati, Cleveland, and other parts of the State. It is not yet decided what route they will take, but it will probably be either by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, or by what is known as the Pan-handle route, via Pittsburg and Harrisburg. The citizens of Columbus, with whom Gov. Hayes is no less popular as a neighbor than as Chief Magistrate, are making preparations for a farewell reception at the Governor's mansion, on Wednesday evening. A delegation numbering about 30 members of the Indiana Legislature arrived here yesterday on a tour of inspection of the public institutions of Ohio, located here. They were much disappointed at not seeing the President elect, who had left for Fremont before their arrival, and they returned home last night. There are very few strangers in Columbus outside of members of the Legislature. There is plenty of gossip about the probable make-up of President Hayes' Cabinet, and the Cincinnati and Columbus papers publish a new list every day, but it is pure speculation, and entirely without any shadow of authority from Gov. Hayes. Equally without authority are all predictions as to what his policy will be toward the South, or on any other public question.

A WARM IMPROMPTU RECEPTION AND SERENADE AT FREMONT, OHIO—SPEECH BY THE PRESIDENT-ELECT—CURIOUS THREATS OF ASSASSINATION—GOV. HAYES WHOLLY UNDISTURBED BY THEM.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

FREMONT, Feb. 25.—Gov. Hayes arrived here last evening, unexpectedly, on the 5 o'clock train, via Fostoria. An impromptu reception was given him at the residence of Gen. R. P. Buckland. Many of the citizens turned out to meet the President-elect, and from 7 o'clock until 10 a stream of people flowed to and from the house. The Light Guard Band serenaded him about 9 o'clock, and the Governor made the following happy little speech to them and the other friends assembled. Gen. Buckland stepped forward and introduced the Governor with a few friends: "I have the pleasure of introducing our President-elect, as we believe."

The Governor then said:

FRIENDS AND NEIGHBORS: The manner in which I am introduced makes it rather easy for me to speak without much embarrassment, but we had better stick to old titles until we are sure of something new. In these times of uncertainty we are often disappointed; the good news of to-day is often dispelled by the evil news of to-morrow. During the few months since the 7th of November, I have schooled myself so as to not be very much down nor very much up, but to try and keep as near the even line as possible. This kindly meeting this evening I do not take so much as honoring me as a congratulation upon the manner in which this strange and peculiar question is now being settled. No other country in the world could have endured such a struggle without suffering lasting calamities. In the event of my remaining among you for the next two or three years, I will attend the next annual pioneers' meeting, and bring a bundle of letters and notes of a kind which I am constantly receiving, containing curiously drawn sketches of knives, daggers, and revolvers. But I have not lost much sleep from any of them yet. One of the most amusing was received this week. It was a knife about two feet long, with one edge backed like a saw, probably for sawing the bones, and the other side for cutting the flesh. This was wrapped in several thicknesses of paper, and inside was a note, as follows: "This is the knife with which the editor of the Capital was to assassinate you as you went from the White House to the Capitol. It was taken from his pants leg while he was asleep." Well, friends, I think I have talked long enough. As I am in the business of shaking hands, I would say that I am enjoying excellent physical health, and, if any of you wish to shake hands, I will be glad to do so, but I will step into the hall out of the cold to shake the hand.

The Governor then stepped into the hall, and the band came forward and extended their congratulations, and shook hands with him. Other friends and citizens kept coming until near 10 o'clock. The affair was a token of hearty good-will toward the Governor, and evinced the high esteem in which he is held by all.

SHOOTING GAMBLERS.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 25.—A shooting affray occurred to-night between Dick Holland and Tom Hartshorn, two gamblers, over the settlement of money matters. Holland, while intoxicated, placed a pistol to Hartshorn's head, but it missed fire, and the latter promptly drew a revolver and placed it at Holland's head with a like result. A second effort was more successful, and Holland was shot in the breast. His wound is not considered fatal. Hartshorn is under arrest.

MINERS' STRIKE AND RIOT IN NOVA SCOTIA

HALIFAX, Feb. 25.—A number of men employed by the Steel Company of Canada, at Londonderry, struck last week on account of some proposed change in wages, were paid off and their places filled with Cornish miners. The strikers attacked the latter last night. A man named MacDougall was shot and killed and several others badly injured.

THE TEXAS MURDER.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 25.—The police have succeeded in finding a trunk of clothing belonging to Bessie Moore, for whose murder in Texas Abe Rothschild was arrested. The trunk was in the baggage-room at one of the railroad depots, where it had been sent by Rothschild.

AFFAIRS IN THE WEST INDIES.

KINGSTON, Feb. 7.—Sir William Grey leaves the Island of Jamaica on the 12th of March for England. The Atlas Steam-ship Company have secured the contract for seven years more for a monthly steam-ship service between Jamaica and New-York. The contract has been given much against popular feeling, which ran in favor of the Pacific Mail; but the latter did not tender, as the Governor would not concede the fixing of the dates of sailing to the company. A severe storm has been blowing for some days on the north side of the island, but is little felt on the south side. It was not considered safe for vessels to leave Dry Harbor and other ports on the north side. Things remain comparatively quiet in Hayti at present, but there is a revolutionary spirit under the surface which may break out at any moment. President Canal's life is not safe, and Gen. Salomon is in Jamaica watching his opportunity. Some 12 insurgents arrived at Jamaica the other day in an open boat from Cuba. They landed on the north side of the island, and proceeded at once to Kingston, where they held a meeting and gave some account of the warfare in Cuba.

THE DELAYED ATTACK ON TURKEY.

THE EASTERN COMPLICATIONS — RUSSIAN TROOPS NOT YET READY TO CROSS THE PRUTH — ARRIVAL OF MONTENEGRIN DELEGATES IN CONSTANTINOPLE—THE FORTIFICATIONS ON THE DANUBE.

LONDON, Feb. 26.—A dispatch from Athens reports that the Cretans refuse to elect Deputies to the Ottoman Parliament. The Governor of the Vilayet of the Danube has sent a telegraphic dispatch to the Turkish Ambassador at London, asserting that the recent affray with the Roumanian troops was caused by an attack made by the latter on some Turkish laborers who were cutting wood on an island belonging to the Turks, and declaring that the Vilayet in the exercise of its rights will take the necessary steps in the matter.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg says: The rumors that the Russian Army has been ordered to cross the Pruth on the 28th inst. are officially denied. The general situation remains unchanged. Further measures on the part of Russia will depend upon the replies to Gortschakoff's circular, and upon the development of affairs in Constantinople.

A dispatch from Constantinople says Col. Valentine Baker has been intrusted with the organization of a gendarmerie.

A Vienna dispatch states that when the Russians enter Roumania Prince Charles intends to withdraw from Bucharest, issue a final appeal for protection to the powers, and then remain a spectator of events.

The Russian Telegraphic Agency announces that the Montenegrin delegates have arrived in Constantinople, and the armistice has been prolonged by mutual accord.

A special dispatch from Guirgevo reports the condition of the fortifications at Rustchuk. The ramparts have been repaired and partly armed with heavy breechloaders. Of five outworks one is armed with 48 Krupps. The others have none of these guns. The garrison numbers 10,000. No steps have been taken to provision the fortress.

A Belgrade correspondent says several Government officials and others, charged with political machinations against the Government, have been arrested.

The Paris correspondent of a morning paper sends the following: "I learn, on trustworthy authority from St. Petersburg, under date of Saturday morning, that a cabinet council was about to be held. The opinion prevailed in well-informed circles that the result of the deliberations might be the resignation of Gortschakoff, and the appointment of Adlersberg as his successor. It is believed also that another result of the proceedings might possibly be an order to demobilize the Southern Army on the ground that in view of the concert of the powers no special reason exists for isolated Russian action."

A special Belgrade dispatch says all day Saturday and Sunday wagon trains have been transporting large quantities of small and large ammunition from the fortress of Belgrade to the quay to be taken down the Danube. This movement contrasts with the peaceful news from Constantinople. Certain Servians are exceedingly afraid the peace movement now in progress will deprive them of any advantages which might result from a successful campaign of the Russians; at the same time they are afraid to refuse to make peace while uncertain of the support of Russia. The situation is liable to produce unexpected results any moment.

The Vienna correspondent of a morning paper says the idea which seemed current in St. Petersburg some little time ago that Russia might withdraw her armies in consideration of some moral satisfaction, such as recognition by Europe of her sacrifices on behalf of the Christians, seems to have made little way, and another idea seems to have taken its place—namely, that six months or a year should be given Turkey to carry out her reforms, and if they are not effected within that period the powers should agree to apply measures of coercion. If the powers agree to this and address an ultimatum to Turkey in this sense Russia might disarm and wait the course of events with the other powers. It cannot be said whether even confidential communications have been made to the powers in this respect, but this seems to be at present considered at St. Petersburg as the only way to enable Russia to disarm and wait.

The Times, in a leader reviewing the above sketch of the Russian attitude, says it may be these declarations are threats designed to compel the powers to do something. It seems certain the powers following England's lead will decline to do anything. The solitary effect of the publication of these declarations is to commit Russia more deeply than ever to the adoption of a policy of coercion.

FUNERAL OF JOHN O'MAHONY.

THE REMAINS TAKEN FROM CORK TO DUBLIN—THE PROCESSION.

CORK, Feb. 25.—The remains of John O'Mahony were taken from the rooms of the Democratic Club to-day and escorted to the Dublin railway station. The weather was fine, and the popular demonstration was a great success. The city was crowded with strangers. Hundreds came in from the country districts, and a large delegation was present from Mitchelstown, the birthplace of the deceased. Thousands thronged the streets through which the funeral cortége passed. The procession was a mile long. The hearse was drawn by six horses. The coffin was covered with the flag of the Sixty-ninth New-York Regiment, and the American and Irish colors. Immediately after the hearse walked the relatives of the deceased and the delegation from the United States. They were followed by the Democratic Club of Cork and the trade organizations with their banners draped. All in the procession wore mourning with green favors. Several bands accompanied the societies.

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

MARSEILLES, Feb. 25.—The Mayor announces that several dockyards will shortly be opened for the relief of the unemployed in this city.

LONDON, Feb. 26.—A Calcutta special says the official report for the week ending Feb. 22 states that rain has fallen in Madras in the districts of Kistna, Mellore, Kurnool, Counbatore, and Tinnevelly and the number of people employed on the relief works has decreased in every district except South Arcot. In Bombay the situation shows no change.

A dispatch from Rome says all the preliminary arrangements regulating the proceedings of future conclaves have been settled and on Friday were submitted to the Pope. They do not affect the main principle of the conclave, but merely modify the ceremonies performed previous to the meeting of the Cardinals.

The Madrid Politica announces that the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs is engaged upon the draft of a treaty of commerce with the United States.

THE NEW CAPITOL.

SOME ARCHITECTURAL CONSIDERATIONS.

WHERE ARCHITECTURE BEGINS—THE WALLS, DOORS, AND ROOF—GREEK, ROMAN, AND GOTHIC SYSTEMS—PROGRESS OF ARCHITECTURE—WORK OF THE FREEMASONS—BLENDING OF STYLES.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Monday, Feb. 26, 1877.

The discussion of the architectural features of the new State Capitol building is engaging so large a share of the attention of the Legislature and of the public that a few words on the principles involved in the matter may be in place at this time. The present question is, whether the construction of the building shall begin anew on the original and abandoned plans; or, whether it shall continue on the plans as modified by the Advisory Board of Architects, which board is composed of three gentlemen, viz., Mr. Eidlitz, the architect of the Jewish synagogue and the Dry Dock Savings Bank in New-York; Mr. Richardson, the architect of that magnificent Episcopal church in Boston, to a description of which several columns were recently devoted in THE TIMES; and Mr. Olmsted, the architect of the Central Park, and so long known in connection with the administration of that beautiful City pleasure ground.

Many gentlemen, and perhaps the majority of those who in a few weeks may be called upon to decide the issue by their votes, frankly confess themselves too little acquainted with architecture to form an intelligent judgment on the question. They desire to do right by the State; they are earnest only to have the best building; they are doubtful only of their own ability to decide for the best interests of the State. To decide between the comparative merits of Greek, Roman, Gothic, Romanesque, Renaissance, or any other style of architecture talked of in connection with the new State building, would indeed be a formidable task; but this is not the present question. To assist, however, at arriving at an intelligent decision on what has to be decided, it may be of some benefit to inquire, first, what is a Greek style of architecture, what a Roman, and what a Gothic, for these three are the primary types of all our architecture. The adaptability of each to the ends sought may be considered after we have found out the thing itself.

In this inquiry we have to remember that the people of Greece built first, the Romans built after them, and the northern or Gothic nations built last. The progressive development of architecture was in like order.

Where, first, does architecture, as apart from mere construction, begin? Here is a wall, or it may be four walls, incloising a square. They may be high or low, of stone or brick, or of dried mud. Whatever the material or the height, they are still walls—of form common to all nations, ages, or races—flat surfaces—nothing more. As they stand we cannot tell, from their form or style only, what race of people built them, if any more than we could tell from the first drawing of a circle what man drew it, though we might instantly detect the hand of the artist if he filled up his circle with a portrait or a landscape. We have, then, the blank walls for the Greek, the Roman, and the Gothic architect to begin work upon. The problem presented is how to contrive the necessary apertures in, and to roof over, these walls, so as to make of them a habitable dwelling, convenient and ornamental. From the point where this work begins we are enabled to detect the hand of the architect.

It is by the manner in which the architects of each nation have roofed over the open space between walls or pillars that we are able to say of this, it is in the Greek form or style; or that, it is in the Roman; of the other, it is in the Gothic.

The Greek architect did his roofing in the simplest and least developed of all styles. He placed two stones upright, and laid another horizontally across them. His doorways, his windows, the space between the pillars, are all roofed in this style: Π. The flat lintel is the only covering of an aperture found in any building the Greek people ever erected. They knew of no other way of doing it; or, at least, if they did, they never used any other. There is a reasonably good example of this style near the new Capitol in this city. At the corner of the park stands the building in which a number of State officers have their business offices. The architect of this has copied the Greek forms. Examine this building. There is no sign of a curved arch over any door or window; each and every one is square-headed. The pillars that rise in the front of the building support no curved arch. Flat blocks of stone cover the spaces between them, though upon these a triangular structure called a "pediment" is supported. The main entrances are square-headed, made as wide as the builder could find a single stone which would reach across and support the weight it has to carry. And it will be noticed that the architect is absolutely limited in the width of his door by this necessity. He must make it so narrow that one stone will do the whole work. In this building, then, we have the skeleton of a Greek structure. A skeleton it is, and nothing more, for the artistic mind of the Greek architect could never have endured so bald a thing as this. He would have filled the gaping front of the pediment with noble statuary; that blank course of stone between the top of the pilasters and the cornice with bold bas-reliefs in bronze or marble. He would have made every part of the building in such exquisite symmetry with every other part that the measure of one being taken would give the measure of every other; it would, under his hand, have grown into a structure which, seen from a distance, would strike

Greek artists and Greek work had become the fashion among them, but in those colossal works of the aqueduct, the amphitheatre, and the bath; the grand arches and vaulted roofs covering spaces that no Greek architect could have roofed without long lines of pillars for supports; the heaping together of vast masses which have withstood the assaults of time century after century. In these we see everywhere the great round arch—the solid semicircle of stone. There is little limit to the architect's imagination with this form at his command. He is no longer confined to making his entrance only as wide as he can get one stone to cover it. He can, if he will, throw his arch in one magnificent sweep over an almost unlimited space. He can pile them up tier above tier, as in the amphitheatre; make them follow each other in stately procession mile after mile, as in the Claudian aqueduct; throw it up in one splendid gateway to endure as the record of military triumph; or root in half a city, as in the baths of Caracalla. All these things the Romans did, but they were not yet fully acquainted with the perfect form, or all the uses of the curved arch. The Roman arch is the semicircle, none other, and therefore it may be said that the character of Roman architecture, and all derived from it, depends upon rooling spaces with round arches.

Look at the new Capitol building. When you have torn away the pillars supporting the cornice over the windows, rubbed off the pilasters projecting from the wall, smoothed away the rustic work on the lower story, you have as the result a wall with endless repetition of apertures having this form: ∩. Apply the same rule to the New-York Post-office building up to the roof, and you have the same result. But this form of arch is not, as before stated, the perfect form. There is another arch which the Romans did not build, but in which perfect strength and highest beauty are united.

I have referred to the dome in the pseudo Greek building in this city. That is a Roman form of structure. The Roman architects were the first to use it. Their roofs are in the pediment form, or vaulted, and sometimes rising into a lofty dome, which, where it rose, marked the most important part of the building it crowned. For observe, a dome was not placed meaninglessly on a building, and merely for the sake of being seen from a long distance. It was lifted over the great hall, at the intersection of the chief parts of the building, over the rotunda, or other principal chamber; and thereby the grandest feature of the exterior of the edifice was made to correspond with and to inuicate the noblest part of the interior. If any one will take the trouble to look at the wooden model of the new Capitol building, as it was to be on the original plans, and then go into the building itself, he will search in vain for any reason why the tower should be placed as it is to be. It might, for any meaning its place has, be set up at either of the four corners of the building, or out on the terrace. Observe also, that the tower, as shown in this model, is not a dome such as the Roman architects built, but is a succession of Greek temples, piled one on the other, pyramid-like, and utterly devoid of meaning. Fortunately, it is not too late to give us a dome which shall have beauty, but it will have to stand where the foundations have been laid.

A word as to the blending of styles in one building. You cannot build into a structure modeled on the Greek forms any curved arch without destroying its Grecian character to just that extent. A curved arch in a building copied from the Grecian would be an anachronism. It would make the style a bad composite, and this for the reason that all Grecian architecture is based upon the horizontal lintel. It does not, however, follow from this that you cannot introduce Greek forms into Roman architecture. This architecture was a development of and grew from Greek; and the process of development is the addition to something already existing, and therefore includes in itself all that existing thing. The Roman architects could properly use in their buildings the forms the Greeks had used; but if the architect of to-day were to introduce into a building modeled on the Roman forms a series of pointed arches, he would project into it an incongruity, for this form of arch was unknown to either Greek or Roman. The pointed arch and the gable A are the distinguishing characteristics of another style of architecture, more developed than any which preceded it—an architecture which includes in itself all known styles, which is modeled after nature herself, and which has given to the Christian world those glorious churches and cathedrals which seem to have been lifted by inspiration to strike with awe and delight the heart of the Christian worshiper. Such an architecture is the Gothic.

It would be foreign to the purposes of this letter to speak at any length of Gothic architecture. Something, however, may be said of the transitional styles which led up from Roman to the pure forms of Gothic, because this will have immediate application to the subject of the new Capitol building, as will appear hereafter. The finest examples of Gothic architecture on the Continent of Europe are, as everybody knows, the work of the Society of Freemasons. This society, instituted in what are called the "Dark Ages," had its origin in the religious spirit of the times, which expressed itself in church building, as in another age it did in the Crusades. The society was chartered by the Pope; it had its Masters and its Grand Masters, and its various divisions traveled from place to place, and "encamped," or "lodged" where an ecclesiastical edifice was to be erected, for Grand Lodges evidently being the permanent bodies or central ones. The society had its trade secrets, as all trade guilds had in those times, and in its hands Gothic architecture reached its highest stage of development. The Reformation gave a complete check to church building, and consequently disorganized the society, which has, however, survived to this time, but with its original purpose and objects quite lost sight of. Many of its secrets were lost with the disorganization of the society, and it has been asserted in many standard works on architecture that some of the arch-work the Freemasons did cannot be repeated now; but Mr. Ediditz informs me that this, so far as it relates to the present day, is an error. Before, however, this great society came into existence and carried architecture to so high a degree of development, the builders of the day had worked on the forms furnished them by the works of the Roman architects. The styles which have come down to us from this transitional period are variously known as Romanesque, Saxon, and Norman. They retain the form of the past, and display the germs of principles which were developed in a later age. The Roman semicircular arch is a leading feature in all. In Romanesque buildings in the south of Europe, where the climate is mild, the roof of church and tower is low-pitched. Coming north, into Switzerland, and further north still, the roof runs up into the sharp gable, and the tower shoots up into the spire. This is the best form to afford protection from the hail and snow storms common in the north; and it need scarcely be pointed out that in such a climate as ours it is the very best form of roof which the ingenuity of man could devise.

The foregoing statements may be conveniently summarized as follows:

1. A style of architecture depends upon the manner in which the rooling of open spaces is done.

2. That Greek architecture, and all derived from it, depends upon rooing spaces with a horizontal lintel; or, as it is sometimes called, the post-and-lintel system.

3. That Roman architecture, and all derived from it, depends upon the use of the round arch in rooling.

4. That Gothic architecture is the system of rooling with the pointed arch and the gable.

5. That the Romanesque forms, being a connecting link between Roman and Gothic architecture, may be so designed as to harmonize with either of these styles.

Of the ideas expressed in the different forms of architecture, and of the methods of ornamentation, as applicable to the new Capitol building, something may be said at another time.

ON FOOT IN THE SOUTH.

THE COTTON MILLS OF ALABAMA.

SUPERIORITY OF THE MANUFACTURING FACILITIES OF THE SOUTH OVER THOSE OF THE NORTH—THE HOME OF CHEAP LABOR—WATER POWER VERSUS STEAM —THE ALABAMA COTTON MILLS AND THEIR CAPACITY.

From Our Special Correspondent.

MONTGOMERY, Wednesday, Feb. 14, 1877.

It is a paradox that Southern countries are the best for manufacturing industries. The absurdity of the statement seems the greater from the fact that in our land, and in all others, the factories of nearly every kind are in the North. The North makes; the South buys. This is the relation of New-England to the United States, of England to her colonies, and of the north of Europe to the south of Europe, excepting a few special industries that are limited to their own localities by the nature of the materials and the monopoly of special skill. But these are merely relations; and relations change quickly and completely in this age. The South may become the workshop of the world.

Every year increases competition and diminishes the margin of profits in industries. The result is that every manufacture is constantly pushed to the place offering the greatest natural advantages. And as the means of transportation improve and competition grows, the difficulties of distance from market, and even from raw materials, are more and more ignored to get cheap labor and cheap power. The inventions of the age and education are obliterating even the fundamental differences of people, by carrying Northern energy into Southern indolence. Capital creates character and skill. So the remotest corner of the earth shall yield its best; and the dollar, with the hammer, shall break the deepest silence, even the dolce far niente of the orange grove.

Other things being equal, the best region for an industry is that one where human life can be healthfully maintained at the least expense. It scarcely needs an argument to prove the superiority of the South in this respect. The absence of severe Winters lessens man's necessities and increases his facilities for supplying those necessities. In regard to shelter, a house of the cheapest kind protects him where it scarcely freezes. Shanties here are sufficient for life, if not comfort, that in the North would be absolutely uninhabitable. Fuel is burned here to cook food, not to thaw frozen fingers. A Northern household—especially one member of it—has some idea how great an economy Robinson Crusoe practiced before Friday made a fire; but a fuller appreciation is gained where the saving can be added up at the end of 10 years and invested at good interest. In regard to clothes, and quoting the same authority, the economy of Friday before Robinson Crusoe made him a suit is an admirable suggestion of thrift. What might be not have made without injuring his wardrobe. Here a workman can live in a cotton suit three-fourths of the year; or the whole year with a trifling addition in Winter. Food in great variety can be got here from a reasonable garden with little work from the 1st of April till January, and the staple articles, corn and and meat, can be grown as cheaply and abundantly as anywhere. In regard to health, the country varies as much as any other, from miasmatic holes to pine hills furnishing the purest water and having the most delightful as well as wholesome climate. From these, and many other considerations, it seems evident that the Southern States are naturally the home of cheap labor.

Cheap power for machinery is abundant. From Virginia to Alabama the country is well watered with rivers flowing from the Alleghanies and the Blue Ridge to the Atlantic. Although some of these streams run through a country too level to give much fall, the most of them have fine sites on their head-waters, and many of them, even in the centre of Alabama, Georgia, and the Carolinas, offer unexceptionable facilities for water-power. Besides water, there is an abundant supply of good coal. The mines of West Virginia and Alabama alone would run all the factories that will be needed for a century. Iron and other minerals are equally plenty and accessible in the same regions.

With cheap labor, cheap power, and cheap materials of many kinds, the South has over the North other advantages that can scarcely be counterbalanced.

One of the most irritating qualities of degeneracy is its ignorance of itself. The State of Alabama has no official or private statement of its cotton, coal, or iron industry. The Secretary of State said, in reply to my demand, "We are very lax about that; I don't know how you will find out unless you go to each establishment." None of those most prominent in the cotton trade know how many mills there are in the State, or even guess at the number of spindles, or the total of their production. The factories are estimated from 7 to 15. If, however, no one tells you what is done, all tell you eloquently, even more than can be done in this industry. Yet, in truth, the advantages claimed over the North are positive, and worthy of close examination. The mildness of the climate is favorable, Water-power here is more economical and reliable by avoiding the damages or freezing. Interruptions of work are fewer, and repairs are more easily made. Dikes and other water-works seldom need attention. No fuel is needed to heat the factory, and very little is used in the drying-room.

Although the economy and reliability of water-power here give it more advantages over steam than can be expected in the North, yet one is by no means compelled to accept it in place of steam. Alabama has great wealth in coal and great facilities for supplying it at low rates. The veins are on the surface and accessible to even the pick-axe and the farm wagon, and railroads are carrying it to all points in the South. The climate also reduces the cost of living to a minimum, and secures, as far as it is possible to secure a changing element, the cheapest labor. In this regard the general stagnation in the South is serviceable. The operatives are, perforce, docile and steady. They are the best of the poor whites; not the worthless class that competed with the slaves in degradation, but the sons and daughters of those who struggled for a living. In some cases the children of farmer planters of wealth are employed in the factories. Those that I have seen look healthy and intelligent. They are considered quite as competent as more expensive labor in the North. They run here the self-acting mule, a machine requiring good hands. Strikes are unknown, and probably will not occur for many years to come—not as long as the people are as unambitious and easy-going as they seem at present. The factories run 12 instead of 10 hours per day. Another custom increases the manufacturer's profits; the hands buy their supplies of all kinds from the factory's store at the regular market prices, and thus return to the manufacturers a large part of their wages.

Besides the climate, the location secures many advantages in purchasing the raw material. The greatest profit is made in buying cotton in the seed. The factory gins it at less expense than the planter can with horse-power. The seeds obtained are worth a profitable price for making oil. The pressed seeds again are sold as cattle food, going even as far as England, or the whole seeds are valuable as manure. About 1,500 pounds of cotton in the seed make a bale of cotton, (500 pounds,) and 40 bushels of seeds, worth 12 cents per bushel at the oil mills. Cotton in the seed, sold in bulk, without baling, having no wrappers of any kind, saves the purchaser about 22 pounds of sacking and hoops per bale. This is a considerable item for a large establishment. Ginned cotton unbaled is the next best form of the raw material. It is delivered at the factory in sheets, or other temporary covers, or else loosely baled in two pieces of sacking, and two or three hoops. This saves the buyer about eight pounds per bale. Even baled cotton in the market here is considerably cheaper than in New-York. The saving on transportation, storage, insurance, as well as the saving of sampling, damage, and decrease of weight, amount to about $10 per bale. This economy should be added to the advantages of buying seed-cotton and unbaled cotton, when comparing the market here and in New-York. Of course, a home market frequently offers peculiar advantages in regard to price, terms, and choice that are not always met in the larger centres of trade.

The absence of all official records makes it impossible to give a valuable estimate of cotton spinning in Alabama. The only source of information is the books of individuals or corporations. These, for obvious reasons, are not often either accessible or reliable authorities; but, in default of any data sufficient for a generalization, they may serve for an indication. The following items from the books of an average factory may be taken as they are given for an individual example of the elements of the business in this region.

The size of the mill is 100 looms; it makes per month about 93,000 yards of Osnaburgs, (30 picks to the inch,) and 38,000 yards of shirting, (44 picks to the inch.) The waste is from 12 to 15 per cent. The cost of labor and findings per yard is about .018. The total cost of Osnaburgs per yard, at the present price of cotton is a fraction over 8 cents. The average of wages to all hands is about $19 per month, distributed as follows:

	Per month.
Lappers	$18 00
Spinners (No. 8 yarn) two frames and four sides	10 00
Warpers	18 00
Spoolers	8 00 to 10 00
Doffers	6 00 to 8 00
Drawing frame hands	10 00
English slubber and speeder	14 00
Lowell slubber and speeder	16 00
Card strippers, on 30-inch cards	10 00
Lowell railway hands	8 00
Drawers-in	8 00
Fireman	18 00
Superintendent	125 00
Osnaburgs, per cut of 43 yards	15
Shirtings, per cut of 52 yards	18
Grinders, per day	1 25
Roller coverer, per day	1 25
Overseers, per day	2 50
Slasher, per day	1 50

A word here about the cost of building a factory. There are plenty of sites unoccupied and for sale at nominal prices. Brick costs $4 per 1,000; lumber from $10 to $12 at the mill; pig-iron, coke, $17 to $20; charcoal, $18 to $22; nails, $3 45 per keg; mechanics, $2 50 to $3 50 per day; common laborers, $13 to $15 per month.

The lagest cotton factory in Alabama is that of the Tallassee Manufacturing Company, at Tallassee, Elmore County. The Tallapoosa River furnishes the power in a fall of 49 feet in 200 yards. The volume of water estimated at the lowest run, is computed to be 80,000 cubic feet per minute, or 7,000 horse power. An experienced man thinks this would run 300,000 spindles. The bed of the river, of solid rock, offers great facilities for the cheap construction of good dams, and the banks afford good sites for buildings. The location is healthy, being on sand hills, covered with pine, and watered with good springs and streams. Its only disadvantage is its distance of six miles over a sandy road from the West Point and Montgomery Railroad. But this defect can be remedied, as the grades are easy for building a branch to the factory. The village of frame houses contains ample accommodations for the hands, a store, and hotel. Wood and supplies are very cheap. Water is distributed to the town and to every floor of the factory from a reservoir of good capacity. The company manufactures nearly everything needed by its business and operatives. It has a foundry, a complete wood-working establishment, grist mill, and saw mill.

The number of operatives is 450. With the exception of a few overseers, they are white natives of the surrounding hills. They will not work with blacks, so negroes are employed only in the picking-house. The wages are about the lowest in the United States. Fourside spinners get from $8 to $12, two-side spinners $4 per month. The average is about $20 per month for the establishment.

The situation is remarkably advantageous in regard to the raw material. Cotton costs the lowest market price, delivered at the factory, ranging from 9 to 12½ cents. It comes unbaled, in sheets, bags, and other temporary covers. This makes a very considerable saving to the company, by avoiding the weight of hoops and sacking that must be bought in the public market. Furthermore the cotton grown about Tallassee is cultivated by whites, and is cleaner than any other sold; the staple is not quite so long, but it makes up into good common grade. With the good crop of last year the loss of material by manufacture was only 9-100; the loss for the month of January was 12-100. The home production nearly supplies the mills. The company buys cotton in the seed and gins it. These advantages of cheap labor and materials enable the Tallassee Mills to manufacture yarns ranging from 3 to 20 at a cost of 3¼ cents. Their sheetings are sold chiefly in New-York; their yarns, in warp and in bunches, are sold in Philadelphia. The total production is 220,000 pounds of all kinds of goods per month. The mills are run at top speed, and are equaled in productiveness by very few in the United States. The works run 18,000 spindles in two buildings. The smaller and older one, built in 1840, is pretty well run down, but it makes 700 pounds of rope per day, and contains 34 looms, making good Osnaburgs. The main mill is 250 feet long by 60 feet wide, with an offset 30 by 70, and five stories high. It was built in 1857, of gray stone, in the most substantial manner. The first floor is devoted to carding, the second to weaving, the third and fourth to spinning, the fifth to warping mills and spoolers. The machinery consists of 28 40-inch cards of English make, 60 36-inch cards from Whitting's works in Massachusetts, 204 Whiting looms, 9 warping mills, 1 slasher, and spoolers. The power, from 700 to 800 horses, is conducted from two Leffel turbine wheels—one 56 inches and the other 66 inches, with a fall of 18 feet.

Notwithstanding the exceptional advantages of this factory, mismanagement has placed it in the hands of Receivers prior to a sale. The company owns several thousand acres of land about the falls and the monopoly of the water-power.

The financial condition of the Alabama factories is unprosperous. All that I have investigated are involved, and these that run are scarcely paying exposures. But this state of things is not necessarily against the industry. The general depression of cotton business in all departments quite justifies the failures here. Besides this excuse, this part of the South, as the centre of the greatest exhaustion by the emancipation of the slaves, is particularly justified in its particular depression. The mills in Georgia, surrounded by a more healthy state of local finances and governed by colder intellectual management, are showing good dividends and extending their capacities. This encourages the Alabamians and makes them confident that their power, location, material, labor, and market will certainly get and give their due.

ALLEGED INHUMANITY AT SEA.

The San Francisco Call of Feb. 17 prints the following almost incredible story: "A horrible story of cruelty comes from the sea, and in this instance the chief victim was the second mate, he who usually drubs the crew in the forecastle and is made the scapegoat of brutal Captains. It was an American ship, the C. O. Whitmore, owned at Bath, Me., and she sailed from Cardiff, in Wales, for Hong Kong on the 27th of May last. The Captain was named Peabody, and the first mate John Henry Snow. Some disgraceful cruelties were practiced before leaving port, leading to a mutiny among the men, and the usual maintenance of authority among the British authorities. Shortly after sailing, James Ellwood, the second officer, displayed qualities of humanity foreign to his superiors, and the better traits of his nature led to an open breach between him and Capt. Peabody, subjecting him to indignities, and eventually to outrage so gross that it cannot be told in detail. He refused to be brutal toward the sailors, and was diseated and sent into the forecastle, a Swede named Charles Stafford being commissioned to his place. The Captain and first officer belabored him with a belaying pin for refusing to be abusive, and off Cape Horn he was tied up for hours together several times. On another occasion he was inhumanly strapped to the keel of a boat and exposed to very severe weather off Cape Horn; and when unstrapped he was ironed and confined in the lazarette, among the old sails, the stores and the rats. Ellwood was a shocking sight on being brought on deck. He was covered with filth; his long beard was matted with blood, which had flowed from five holes in the top of his head; his left cheek bone was fractured; his left eye blind; his right eye blackened; his wrists were covered with sores; the lower part of his back was perforated with an ugly wound, and his body was covered with terrible suffering from the lice of the log. At Hong Kong Peabody, Snow, and Stafford were arrested, but on a question of extradition they were discharged, after a week's imprisonment. The C. O. Whitmore is now en route for New-York, but neither Peabody nor his officers are on board. Eight of the witnesses have been forwarded to this port, and are in confinement at Alcatraz awaiting an examination whenever an opportunity offers. The facts of the case are in the possession of the United States District Attorney, and should Peabody, Snow, and Stafford ever come within the jurisdiction of the United States they are liable to prosecution for murder at sea."

THE SECRETS OF THE CONFESSIONAL.

The Court of Cassation at Brussels has given an important decision relative to the privileges of priests in what is called "professional secrecy." The Abbé Wautelet had received from a member of his congregation the confidential declaration that that he was about to fight a duel. The priest gave information to the Police, who took the proper steps to prevent the meeting; but the Abbé, on being called to give evidence before the examining magistrate, declined to do so on the ground of his sacred functions. He was fined 50 francs, and, he having appealed against this judgment, the court has now confirmed that sentence, ruling that all citizens are bound to enlighten justice, and that the priest cannot claim the benefit of article 458 of the Penal Code of 1863, unless he has received the communication in confession; outside of that limit he cannot claim "professional secrecy."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MR. GLOVER'S COMMITTEE.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON REAL ESTATE POOL, &C., EXPLAINS AND DEFENDS HIS COURSE.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Permit me to correct the Washington dispatch in your issue of to-day concerning the Real Estate Pool Committee and myself. Considering the fact that the House directed the committee as far as practicable to investigate nearly all official misconduct that might be brought to their notice, and considering the great amount of such abuses that have been brought to its notice, the number of subpœnas issued has been small, and the expense of its entire action is very small indeed. Its action has never aimed at mere partisan or sensational effect, but at discovering the truth, the punishment of wrong doers, and the correction of wrongs. "The discarded telegraphic dispatches" were not purchased by me but by the House, and the purchase was made not in the hope of making "startling discoveries," but in pursuit of the proof of information in my possession. Whether startling discoveries have been made the public will in due time be informed. But the uneasiness in various quarters which the purchase of this material has produced shows there was strong reason for their examination, which view is confirmed by the testimony given before the committee yesterday to facts indicating an attempt at burglary upon them. I have yet to learn that the Chairman of a committee, after an inquiry has begun, is under obligation to wait about summoning a witness till his colleagues have been consulted. The statement that witnesses have been examined by me without the knowledge of my colleagues, and without an opportunity for cross-examination, is untrue. The pressure of the Presidential question has materially delayed the completion of the committee's business, and hence members of the committee have been deputed to take the testimony of witnesses unwilling to wait till the full committee could assemble, which proceeding is in accordance with long established practice. In no instance has a witness been discharged without notice and opportunity for cross-examination, to absent members. Witnesses are now in attendance awaiting cross-examination. No meeting of the committee has been held without notifying at least a majority of the members. My effort has always been to have the meetings of the committee full, and to have both political parties represented at every meeting. No testimony has been taken without the consent of a majority of the committee. To avoid the publication of scandal, which the instigator of the dispatch accuses me of raking up, and to secure the publication of the truth alone, have been the object of taking testimony at times with closed doors. Had I desired to "rake up scandal," the numerous amount of complaints against officials, which has been laid before me, and which I have never given to the public because I have not been satisfied with their truth, has afforded ample material. In this connection it is proper to say, that I have, within a few days, twice suppressed the names of parties about whom unfavorable testimony was given, because no good would have resulted from drawing them out, to say nothing of the pain that might have been caused to innocent persons. I have also caused testimony to be struck out where its statements appeared to be frivolous and unfounded. The statement in the dispatch that I "examined, a few days ago, a discharged Treasury clerk, who testified to all manner of things in connection with the redemption and cancellation of currency; this same witness was examined last Summer by Clover, but has quite enough to do with his pen more fully since then," is wholly untrue. No discharged Treasury clerk has been before the committee at any time, and the occurence narrated in the above extract never took place. While it is true that testimony has been given that, if correct, would be injurious to Gen. Garfield, it has been taken in secret session for the express purpose of preventing the publication of unfounded scandal, and of giving Gen. Garfield, should it appear necessary, an opportunity to be heard before publication is decided upon. Yet of this case the author of the "big charges is of "scandal-mongering" complains. The statement that Mathew Richardson is a discharged Treasury clerk is an error. Mr. Richardson produced to the committee the Acting Secretary's acceptance of his resignation. But were he a discharged clerk, this would not materially affect the value of his testimony, as from persons connected with the Treasury Department very little information of its great corruption and mismanagement can be obtained. His colleagues still in the Treasury Department who were on the Counting Committee with him, testified strongly to his efficiency, intelligence, and entire trustworthiness. The sender of the dispatch sees fit to characterize the facts given by Mr. Richardson (who deserves much credit for his course in the matter) as "impossible irregularities," but how he, who was not present or partaking in these matters, comes to know so much more about them than Mr. Richardson, the officials of the committee having them in charge, I am not advised. When the report of my committee is presented, which in a few days it will be, the action of this committee will need no vindication. J. M. GLOVER, Chairman of the Select Committee on Real Estate Pool, Jay Cooke & Co.'s Indebtedness, and Official Misconduct.

CITY SALARIES.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

You have justly called attention to the salaries paid to certain officials of the City Government, and recommended that they be cut down to the real value of the services rendered. This is all very well so far as it goes, but it does not touch the root of the disease. I am a City official, and I know whereof I speak. There is usually one or two employes in each office who hold their positions, not because they have an Alderman or ward politician at their back, but because they are capable and the work of the office could not go on without them. They do their own work and that of every one else in the office. These men are capable men, and could get permanent positions elsewhere if turned out. The position they hold (and this is the real cause of the evil) is very uncertain one. They are liable not only on a change of politics but on the appointment of every new Commissioner to be turned out. Can you expect such men to work in such a place for the same salary that they would in one that secured to them "during life or good behavior." If you reduce their salaries to a level with what they can obtain in permanent positions, they will all gradually drop out and leave none in office except the appointees of the politicians. The latter end of our City Government will be worse than the first.

If you really want to reduce the expenses of the City in the matter of salaries, you will advocate the appointment of all clerks, &c., by public examination, open to all competitors who can produce evidence of their citizenship and good character, and conducted in some manner to insure fair dealing, and then to make the positions for life during good behavior, or so long as the branch of the service they are in is continued. You will then get good men willing to work for a reasonable salary, and you won't need to employ one quarter the number which now encumber the pay-rolls of the City.

MR. CHOMEL'S BOAT.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Without finding fault with the witty article in your edition of to-day, under the head "Auxiliary Fat Men," and purporting to give a description of my boat, I will feel it an act of justice if you allow me to state that the writer has not seen the working model, for he would then have seen that none of his propositions were ever entertained by me. The machinery which he describes would never propel a boat. The speed which he supposes will never be attained; neither will the dead July calm reduce it to a complete standstill. The proposition to utilize the unexpended energy of fat men would also have appeared to him ridiculous if he had seen the plan by which the necessary exercise of cattle is made to impart motion when in a calm. I must submit to all kinds of criticism, scientific, practical, skeptical, interested, or witty, but justice requires that it should be fair. J. A. CHOMEL.

SATURDAY, Feb. 24, 1877.

A PUBLIC MEETING DEMANDED.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Your article of to-day (Feb. 24) suggesting the "interposition of the popular will" for the purpose of securing the completion of the Presidential count before the 4th of March, is eminently pertinent. You most truthfully say:

"The business classes of the large cities prayed for the enactment of the bill creating the Commission; now let them tell Congress that the decision of the Commission shall be respected. There is no time to be lost. Within a week the election must be perfected or the country will be on the verge of political chaos. An expression of public opinion is needed to bring the conspirators to their senses, and to be of any avail it must be immediate and emphatic."

Now let there be in this City a great meeting of the people, irrespective of party, who shall tell their servants in Congress that they are in no temper to stand any further delay on this subject.

FICTION EXTRAORDINARY.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Any advice given in the American Library Journal, with reference to the formation of a small public or subscription circulating library, ought to be accepted as good. In the number just issued I was puzzled with an article by Mr. Perkins, of the Boston Public Library, purporting to give a list of the "Best Hundred Novels." Among the list—and the selection is, in my humble estimation, a very defective one—I was astonished to find The Pilgrim's Progress! This is followed by Swift's Tale of a Tub! It is true, the learned writer confesses that he has never read the latter work; hence his ignorance of its true character. Out of 14 of Scott's novels, are included three of the least attractive.

EX-JOURNALIST.

THE VACANT JUSTICESHIP.

THE PROPRIETY OF HAVING DIFFERENT SECTIONS REPRESENTED ON THE SUPREME BENCH—SAMUEL F. PHILLIPS, OF NORTH CAROLINA, A FIT SUCCESSOR TO JUSTICE DAVIS.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I have seen in several journals some discussion as to who should be the successor of Mr. Justice Davis upon the bench of the Supreme Court. The reasons which have been given in favor of the claims and merits of different individuals have, in the main, been of the ordinary character of political advertising. Some good suggestions have been made, however. One of the best is that of a leading New-England journal, to the effect that there is no man living in the nation of such supereminence of mind, culture, or character as to be singled out among his 40,000,000 of fellow-citizens by the finger of public approval as pre-eminently fitted for the place. There are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of men in the country who would fill the place with honor and faithfulness, and to the entire satisfaction of the country. A Mobile paper has an able article on the claims which the South has, that the vacancy shall be filled by one of her citizens. There is much force in this suggestion. Of course, there is nothing compelling an equal distribution of the Judges among all the States or sections of the Union, and it is well that there is not; but there is a sort of impression in the minds of all that it is only fair that location should be considered, and, as between persons of equal merit, be decisive in favor of one or the other. The present local distribution of the Justices is peculiar. The extreme North-east has Clifford; the Middle States have Hunt, Bradley, and Strong; the Chief Justice and Justice Swayne are from Ohio; the North-west has Miller from Iowa, and the Pacific slope has Field of California.

It has been contended that a sort of representation of different sections upon the court is eminently desirable, in order that the customs, habits of thought, and all those local peculiarities which enter into and give an unconscious flavor to the law of every people, may be fully apprehended and appreciated by the tribunal which has ultimately to pass upon the rights of the citizens. Whether this be a valid plea or not, it is undeniable that it has often controlled in a great measure the appointment of Judges, and that the special knowledge derivable only from continued familiar intercourse with the people of a section has often been of infinite service to the court. Mr. Justice Field's knowledge of Spanish titles, and Justice Davis' familiarity with Government lands, are instances of this. The same is said to have been eminently true of the nautical experience and knowledge of a late member of the court. The South is by far more anomalous, when compared with the rest of the nation, than any of the regions from which the present Judges come. It is idiosyncrasic in custom, law, and habit of thought to a degree which even California cannot rival. It was not without reason that the South, before the war, claimed a distinct and peculiar civilization. Instead of this dissimilarity having been removed or reduced by the results of the war, it has, if possible, been enhanced by the fact of emancipation, and the swiftly following enfranchisement of the recently subject race.

There is every possible reason, then, for saying that the place soon to be vacated by Judge Davis should be filled by a Southern man, if there can be found one possessing the necessary qualifications, and whose fitness for the position would, upon a careful scrutiny of his life, be recognized and admitted by all. To do this he must combine the following prerequisites: First, he must be a man of middle age, of eminence in his profession, and of undoubted purity of character; second, his life previous to and during the rebellion must have been such as to inspire the whole country with confidence in his unswerving fidelity to the Union; third, his course subsequent to the war must have been in harmony with the principles resulting from the struggle, in order that the country may feel that the fruits of victory may not be endangered by the action of the tribunal of which he shall be a part.

Such a man in every respect is Samuel F. Phillips, of North Carolina, the present Solicitor General of the United States. An earnest, quiet, consecrated lawyer, who was ornament to his profession in his own State, who had just declined an appointment as Judge of its highest court, he was surprised beyond measure when he received a telegram from the President asking if he would accept the position made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Bristow. Though a well-known Republican—one of the few prominent ones who will remain in the South—his course from earnest and sincere conviction, without the hope or desire of office or reward—his modesty was such that he had never aspired to any of the positions which his merits and prominence entitled him to claim. It is said that his extraordinary legal attainments led to the selection of Mr. Bristow, who recommended him as his successor. The writer knows it to have been without the knowledge or solicitation of Mr. Phillips.

Before and during the war Mr. Phillips was one of the leaders of the Union men of his State. Unlike most others of that class, his convictions were too strong to yield even when secession had become an accomplished fact and its success seemed probable. He retired from public life and only came forth from his seclusion after the close of the war to declare his earnest adhesion to the principles underlying the reconstruction acts. While always a man of decided convictions, he has never taken part that might be termed a partisan. Of strictly temperate life and studiously devoted to his profession, he is one whom the Bar of the country would always honor and respect. As a leader, he has been in his own State more nearly the counterpart of Chief Justice Waite—no more than any other public man—known and respected as a leading Republican, yet not regarded as an active politician. In his present position he has won golden opinions from all who have had any business relations with him by steady, honest, manly work, never slighting what he has been called upon to do, nor becoming careless in following the line of his office.

It is evident from the kindly eulogiums which the court have frequently passed upon him that there is no one they would more gladly welcome to a seat with themselves, and when Mr. Hayes shall become the Chief Executive he can in no way do himself greater honor than by nominating to the vacant Justiceship this thoroughly liberal son of the South, the learned, laborious, and capable Solicitor General. That the South has a right to preference when she can put forth a man of such merit as Mr. Phillips no fair-minded Republican can deny. It is unfortunately true that the Republican Party of the South has few men who would be proper candidates for such preferment. Perhaps the whole South could not furnish another man combining the necessary requisites. If the Republican Party desires to leave no reasonable excuse for a "solid South" hereafter, it will do well to consider the claim of these Southern Republicans, now on the Supreme Bench, and of such men as Mr. Phillips to represent that section. PRUSSIAN ARMY OFFICERS.

The Prussian Army list for the present year shows that the nobility and bourgeoisie of the country are represented in almost equal proportions among the officers, without distinction of rank, but not among the general and field officers, for out of 1,624 of the latter there are only 558 not noble. All the 52 Generals, all but one of the 69 Lieutenant Generals, and all but 20 of the 152 Generals of brigade, are noble. All the commanders of army corps and Generals of division belong to the nobility, while of the 95 Major Generals in command of brigades 12 are commoners. Among the 336 Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels, and Majors in command of regiments, there are 45 commoners; and among the 1,055 Lieutenant Colonels and Majors not in command of regiments there are 466 commoners. In the cavalry, which is the branch of the service most favored by the aristocracy, the disproportion is much more marked, for of the 930 general and field officers only 81 are not noble, while in the artillery there are 177 field-officers belonging to the bourgeoisie out of a total of 257. As a rule, the commoner element prevails in the artillery and engineers. The army list also shows that the guard, both cavalry and infantry, is a very "exclusive" corps; for out of 160 field officers only one Lieutenant Colonel and four Majors belong to the bourgeoisie.

HOW GOV. HAYES SAVED HIS ARM.

The Springfield (Ohio) Republic of the 22d inst. says: "Gov. Hayes was wounded in the arm at South Mountain. The surgeons said it must come off and proceeded to make all necessary preparations for amputation. The General was at Middletown, Md., at the residence of a gentleman well-known here, and this gentleman begged him to allow his family physician—Dr. Bare, of Middletown—also well-known here—to take charge of him. He consented, and although the Army surgeons were displeased, the Docter assumed the care of the General and managed the case so skillfully that amputation was rendered unnecessary. This accounts for the fact that the next President will have two arms."

THE NEW PALACE OF INDUSTRY NOW BUILDING ON THE SEINE—2,000 LABORERS AT WORK—BEAUTIFYING THE FAIREST CITY OF THE EARTH—GENERAL DISPOSITION OF THE NEW BUILDING—THE TOTAL COST—A LARGE SUM SET APART FOR PRIZES.

From the London News.

"It is all to beguile the proletary," observed a philosopher on the top of a Passy omnibus, as he looked compassionately through the smoke of a short pipe at the new Palace of Industry, now building on the banks of the Seine. "Those deceivers at Versailles call the high jinks we are to have next year another 'labor assizes,' because we are always ready to pay for fine words; but it would be truer to describe them as the latest sophistries in use to cozen the working man out of his political principles." When the speaker had deliberately offered these sentiments for the general admiration of his traveling companions he sighed in the cozy, self-comforting way of a man with a robust appetite, who is fond of good eating, and has enough of it; then he indulgently filled himself another pipeful of Government tobacco, and evid

MAHAFFY'S GREECE.

RAMBLES AND STUDIES IN GREECE. By J. P. MAHAFFY. New-York: MACMILLAN & Co.

Mr. Mahaffy, the author of the well-known book upon the social life of the ancient Greeks, has recently made a visit to Greece, and has published a very able and entertaining accounnt of his journey. The book lights up every part of the subject upon which it touches. Thoroughly prepared by an extensive acquaintance with Greek literature and history to get the full benefit of a sojourn in Greece, Mr. Mahaffy has seen the country with an enjoyment and an eager curiosity of which only a good scholar would be capable. The objects of the journey were various. The author wished, of course, to see the antiquities of the country, but he was also interested in politics, trade, education, and all such matters as would affect the character of the modern inhabitants of Greece. He had studied long the real character of the ancient Greeks, and he was anxious to see if modern Greece showed a social spectacle resembling that which he conceives to have existed in ancient Greece. Mr. Mahaffy is no extravagant admirer of the old Greeks. In his book on Social Life in Greece he has expressed the opinion that the pictures usually drawn of the ancient Greeks are idealized, and that the real people were of a different and lower character. "What is very remarkable," he writes, "and worth quoting in confirmation of my judgment, is this—that intelligent people at Athens, who had read my opinions formerly hazarded upon the subject, were so struck with the close resemblance of my picture of the old Greeks to the present inhabitants that they concluded I must have visited the country before writing these opinions, and that I was in fact drawing the classical people from the life of the moderns." Mr. Mahaffy believes that the race, like the language, is very much what it was 2,000 years ago. M. About's Grèce Contemporaine expresses a similar opinion. About found many modern traits which coincide with the testimony of Greek literature. He noticed that the Greek men are now, as formerly, handsomer than the women, and that they are much more particular about their dress and appearance. For instance, it is the men in Greece who wear the stays; the women are innocent of them. Mr. Mahaffy makes the same remark. He says: "You may see any day at Athens a dandy so pinched in the waist as to remind one of the Wasps of Aristophanes."

Mr. Mahaffy's general estimate of the modern Greeks is extremely favorable—much more so, indeed, than he expected it would be while upon his travels. The record of his impressions shows that his temper was often tried by the jealousy of the people, the want of a good civil administration, and the carelessness of the country concerning their antiquities. He says that he has purposely retained these impatient expressions in order that his generally hopeful view of the country may be made stronger thereby.

He thinks that the Greeks are very clever—that they show the ability to win the highest success in almost any path. That they do not succeed in agriculture is due to the very quickness which makes them so keen at trade and politics. They say with the son of Sirach: "How can he have wisdom whose talk is of bullocks." Notwithstanding their natural tastes for politics, Mr. Mahaffy holds the Greeks are not fit for constitutional government. He draws a parallel between Greece and his own country, Ireland. In his view, Ireland is no more fit for a constitutional government than Greece. He finds also a striking analogy between Irish and Greek jealousy of foreign interference. Ireland, not yet recovered from the unjust laws and restraints under which she has so long suffered, finds herself far behind-hand in comparison with Scotland and with England. She has not the capital with which to develop the natural riches buried in her soil, but the people have a sort of vague pride in these riches; there is a sentiment that they would have been already utilized had it not been for foreign oppression: so that when the English come over and invest their capital in Irish agriculture or mines, or fisheries, the jealousy of the natives gets the better of their reason. They destroy machinery, write threatening letters, and use other violence to scare away the wealth of which they are always regretting the want.

But the Greeks have a better excuse for their jealousy of foreign interference than the Irish. The greatest wealth of the country, and that which gives it most value in the eyes of Europe, is its rich store of antiquities. It is only natural that they should be jealous of foreigners carrying away their treasures and adorning with them the museums of their capitals. It is true that most of these remains are yet undiscovered and unrestored; and strangers are, of course, willing to expend their own money in exploring sites, provided the objects gained may be their own. But are the Greeks to be greatly blamed for preferring to wait for the day when they will be able to recover these remains for themselves? The agricultural capitalist, moreover, must enrich the country which he improves, while the archæological capitalist does quite the contrary; unless bound under very strict conditions he will only rob it. But Greek jealousy is unfortunately not confined to a dislike of foreign interference with their antiquities. The attempts of foreign capitalists to work the mines of Laurium have been frustrated by legislative restrictions which this jealous spirit has dictated. A great company to work the mines was started some years ago by French and Italian speculators. But the Greeks no sooner discovered that the company were making a profit than they caused unjust legislation against them, and to avoid being plundered the foreign company sold the property to a native company. This jealousy Mr. Mahaffy found to be a very prominent trait of the Greek character. Everywhere he met the greatest personal kindness from individuals, but the general feeling of Greek society toward foreigners is jealous and hostile.

The traveler gives some amusing pictures of constitutional government in Greece. He was at Thebes just at the time the general elections were pending. M. Boulgaris had just been dismissed. The King had decided to try the constitutional experiment, and had called to office M. Trikoupes, a pronounced radical. Mr. Mahaffy's special friend and patron at Thebes was the radical candidate, and at the time of his arrival was canvassing his constituency. "Every low fellow in the town," he writes, "seemed to think it his duty to come up into his drawing-room, in which we were resting, and sit down to encourage him and advise him. No hint that he was engaged in entertaining strangers had the smallest effect, and so garlic and dirt were inflicted upon us till the welcome announcement of dinner, to which, for a wonder, his constituents did not follow him." The candidate told Mr. Mahaffy that, though all the country was strongly in favor of Mr. Trikoupes, he could hardly count with safety upon a majority, since he had determined not to seek to control the election by means of soldiers. In this most constitutional country, formed upon the model of England, up to 1875, the soldiers stood round the polls and hustled any one who came to vote against the Government candidate. Mr. Trikoupes refused to take this precaution, and so lost his election. But at the time of Mr. Mahaffy's visit the Radical Party were very confident. They were not only to be returned in triumph throughout the whole country, but their first steps would be to prosecute M. Boulgaris for his violation of the Constitution, and to condemn him to hard labor, with confiscation of property. Mr. Mahaffy found some amusement in pleading the cause of the hated statesman, especially with the ladies, who were fiercer than the men, ready, as he remarks, like their goddess of old, to eat the raw flesh of their enemies. Mr. Mahaffy asked them if it would not be in very bad taste for Mr. Disraeli to prosecute Mr. Gladstone for violating the Constitution in his Irish Church act, and have him condemned to hard labor. They replied that the cases were quite different. No Englishman could ever attain or even understand the rascality of the late Minister. Thinking this might be, perhaps, true, the traveler changed his point of attack, and asked whether they were not afraid if they persecuted M. Boulgaris in this violent way that he might betake himself to the mountain passes and go to robbing Englishmen, and thus bring the Government into discredit. They said no; he was too rich. But if they confiscated his property, would he not be poor? True, they replied; but he would still be unable to do that; he was too old. It seemed never to occur to them that he might be too respectable. This dreadful culprit was returned to power some six months later.

The Greeks, like ourselves, have a bad civil service. They practice the principle of rotation in office to even a greater degree than we. A man is no sooner in an office than there is a general outcry that he should get out of it. Among us politicians are turned out by politicians; the office-holders are overcome by the office-seekers, and the public has been indifferent about the matter. But in Greece public sentiment seems to favor frequent changes; a feeling such as existed among our people 40 years ago exists now in Greece, that every dog should have his day. Many of the Greek politicians are paupers, who "will not dig, and to beg they are ashamed;" so they sit about the Athenian cafés on the look-out for one of the 10,000 places which have been devised in order to give patronage to the Ministry. But as there are 30,000 expectants, it follows that the 20,000 disappointed candidates are always at work seeking to drive from office the 10,000 successful ones. Hence a crisis every three months. Hence it is that a Greek Envoy can hardly reach his post before he is recalled. It is on this account that thrifty and industrious Greeks go to Smyrna, to Alexandria, and Manchester, and engage in the commerce of these places rather than waste their energies on the petty squabbles and in pursuit of the precarious rewards of Greek politics.

Mr. Mahaffy has some interesting things to say upon the subject of brigandage. In describing his visit to Marathon, he says: "Presently we came upon a thickly-wooded cover, which was pointed out to us as the spot where our unfortunate countrymen were captured in 1870 and carried up the slopes of Pentilicus, to be sacrificed to the blundering of the English Minister or the Greek Ministry—I could not decide which—and, more certainly, to their own chivalry; for, while all the captured Greeks escaped during the pursuit, our English gentlemen would not break their parole." These men, Mr. Mahaffy says, are now held by the better Greeks to be martyrs for the good of Greece; for it was this outrage which first forced the Government into a vigorous effort to secure the safety of the country. The whole band was caught and executed, till Takos, their chief, was hanged two or three years afterward at Athens. Mr. Mahaffy found the country entirely safe. He was, indeed, provided with a missive from the Greek Prime Minister, the object of which was to incite the Police to take special care of him. This missive he gave to the chief Police officer of each town—a gentleman in a scarlet cap and white petticoats, and carrying a great dog-whip as his sign of office. Strange to say, the dog-whip is a custom which dates from the days of Aristophanes. The Prime Minister warned Mr. Mahaffy that, though things were now safe, there was no permanent security. The existence of danger from brigands depends upon the state of things beyond the Turkish border. Any revolution in the neighborhood, such as that in Herzegovina, was sure, he said, to send into Greece a number of Turkish outlaws and fugitives, who would support themselves by levying a tax on the peasants and upon travelers. The Peloponnesus, the Greeks allege, has always been safe, and will always be, because it is difficult for brigands to escape thence into Turkey. The traveler, therefore, may even now go in perfect security to Sparta, Argos, or Corinth, but he cannot be certain of safety on a visit to Thermopylæ, Delphi, and Marathon. The Professors in the University at Athens Mr. Mahaffy found more sanguine. They considered Greece a very safe and quiet country. One of them gave a reason for the opinion which seemed by no means reassuring; this was that for full two years no bandit had been seen or heard of throughout the country. On one point, however, all were agreed, that the presence of bandits would be at once known at Athens. Mr. Mahaffy says, by the way, that it is idle to imagine that firearms are a protection against Greek bandits. The first notice given to the traveler is a summons to surrender from an ambush from which 20 or 30 muskets "cover" him. Unless the party be too numerous to be surprised, arms are only another temptation to the brigands.

The narrow boundaries which the European politicians have given to Greece have greatly increased the difficulty of dealing with brigands. By refusing to include Thessaly and Epirus within the Greek dominions, the Turkish frontier has been left so close at hand that a criminal may very easily escape over the border, while bands of brigands may live in Turkey and carry on their business in the neighborhood of Athens. The Greeks say that they have always been able to keep down brigandage in the Morea, and that the existence of it in Northern Greece was due to the failure of the Turkish authorities to co-operate with them. Since 1870, when the Turks placed a vigorous Governor over Thessaly, there have been no brigands even in the north. But as the present happy state of things depends upon the accident of a good appointment by the Porte, Mr. Mahaffy thinks it evident that there should be a change in the boundaries of Greece. Thessaly and Epirus should be added to the country. The main population will readily join the Greeks, and the few Turks in those provinces will continue to practice their own faith in greater liberty than before. This is evident from the fact that 10,000 Turks are now living in Eubœa, entirely free and contented under the Greek Government.

That Greece should be really prosperous she needs, more than anything else, population. Concerning the curious old problem of the sudden depopulation of Greece Mr. Mahaffy has much to say. This began just after the loss of Greek liberties, and is in no way due to the misrule of Turk or modern Greek. The fact has never been explained, though there is no doubt that it is a fact. "The whole of Greece," says one traveler, "could not put in the field as many soldiers as some of old from a single city." Another says: "Of all the famous cities of Bœotia, but two—Thespiæ and Tanagra—now remain." No doubt, every enterprising young fellow went off to Asia as a soldier or merchant; and this taste for emigrating has remained strong in the race till the present day. But besides this, the race itself became, at a certain period, less prolific. Mr. Mahaffy found that this sterility has lasted to the present time. "In the many hospitable houses," he says, "in which I was entertained through the country, I sought in vain for children. The young married ladies had their mothers to keep them company, and this was a common habit. The daughter does not willingly separate from her mother, but whether by curious comcidence or not, the absence of children in these seven or eight houses was very remarkable."

We have given our attention mainly to what the author has had to say of the social and political aspects of Greece; but the book is largely occupied with the arts of old Greece. There is a great deal of intelligent discussion of antiquities, of which the work contains, likewise, some interesting illustrations. But even in writing on these themes, the author's eye is constantly running back and forth between the Old and the New World. He gives Mr. Gladstone a thrust over the shoulders of Pericles. In speaking of the nature of the assistance which Pericles gave to Phidias, he remarks:

"But I do not fancy that Greek statesmen in those days studied everything else in the world besides state-craft, and were known as antiquarians and linguists, and connoisseurs of china and paintings, and theologians and novelists—in fact, every thing under the sun. This manysidedness, as they now call it, which the Greeks called polupragmosune, and thought to be meddlesomeness, was not likely to infect Pericles. He was very intimate with Phidias, and is said to have constantly watched his work—hardly, I fancy, as an adviser; but rather as an humble and enthusiastic admirer of an art which did realize its ideal, while he himself was striving in vain with rebel forces to attain his object in politics."

Mr. Mahaffy is very discursive; we think too much so. He has thought it well to write a "book of digressions" in order to describe his impressions as the events of the journey suggested them. The result has been that he repeats himself somewhat too often. But his book is most interesting and instructive, and the author evidently a man of strong sense and high cultivation.

A HISTORY OF SAVINGS BANKS IN THE UNITED STATES, from their Inception in 1816 down to 1874, with discussions of their theory, practical workings, and incidents, present condition, and prospective development. By EMERSON W. KEYES, late Deputy Superintendent of the Banking Department of the State of New-York. Vol. I. New-York: ALBERT RHODES. 1876.

The very full title of the above work conveys a fair idea of its general character. The author, Mr. Keyes, was for a number of years connected with the Banking Department of this State, and while so engaged made the principles and history of saving banks the subject of very careful and intelligent study. So far as we are aware, his reports on the various points connected with the management of these institutions are among the fullest, clearest, and most authoritative discussions of this subject matter. He was largely instrumental in reducing the conduct of savings banks in New-York to a simple and comprehensive system, and in establishing in the laws of the State the safeguards which now exist for the interests of depositors.

The work, of which we have the first volume, is very faithfully prepared, and ought to be diligently studied by all who are engaged, in any responsible connection, with the affairs of a savings bank. As a narrative of the growth of savings banks in this country, and a statement of the marvelous accumulations of which they have had charge, the work is interesting, and this unquestionably is the feature of it which has given the author the most labor and pains. But, in our view, the most interesting, as well as the most valuable portion of the work, is its discussion of the nature of savings banks; of the purposes which should be kept in view in their management, of the limits within which their deposits, their investments, and their dividends should be kept, of the means by which responsibility, accuracy, and fidelity are to be obtained from their officers, and of the extent to which the law can regulate them. These various points are traced in the legislation of different States and in the history of their banks, and he must be a very dull or a very indifferent bank officer who does not gain from even a cursory attention to them a clearer idea of his duties and his opportunities.

Nor will the book be without value to the general reader, and it should be found in every considerable library. The work of a Trustee or officer of a savings bank is a very delicate, and, sometimes, a very difficult one. So far as the Trustees are concerned, it generally is and ought always to be, unpaid, so that the only requital for service rendered is in the consciousness of having done an important task well, and in the respect and confidence of the public. But the latter is not always given where it is deserved, because the public understand but indifferently how it has been earned, and Mr. Keyes' work is calculated to help to an intelligent understanding of this point. If it had no other effect than to aid the great number who use savings banks in appreciating right management and in detecting and avoiding wrong management, it would be valuable.

ILLUSTRATED ART CATALOGUES.

The American Society of Painters in Water Colors has stolen a march on the Academy by introducing, in their catalogue of the exhibition now on view, an improvement that has been mooted for the catalogue of the coming exhibition of oil paintings. This is no less an improvement than the introduction of small etchings of many of the pictures into the body of the catalogue, after the manner which has obtained in Paris, and, latterly, in London. The English authorities, as we take it, do not allow or sanction this proceeding; but Mr. Blackburn, the enterprising publisher of the illustrated catalogues of 1875 and 1876, has been compelled to do his work by visiting the Royal Academy, and carrying away in his mind the pictures he intended copying. Of course, there will be no fear of such restrictions here. On the contrary, the likelier result will be that artists will etch for their own satisfaction the general outlines or the more important parts of their works accepted for the exhibition, and themselves supply the catalogue with the pictures. Of course, a book filled with etchings by the artists themselves will be greatly enhanced in value. The present catalogue can only be called a first attempt, but it is, nevertheless, a success, some of the pictures being as good, we venture to say, as those of Mr. Blackburn's catalogue of the London Academy. There is no reason why that of the coming exhibition in oils should not be a really handsome piece of art in itself. Especially if it can be got ready for the opening day will such a novelty be sure of a deserved success. The process by which the pen-and-ink sketch of each picture is reduplicated is called photo-engraving. An electroplate of the sketch is the result, and the work of the engraver is superseded, thus securing an easy and cheap means of adding to the text of the catalogues a running commentary in the shape of the pictures themselves. The water-color exhibition, which has introduced this method, will be open till the 4th of March in the rooms of the Academy of Design, on Fourth avenue.

IS THIS CONSISTENT WITH THE TRUTH?

COVINGTON, Ky., Feb. 23, 1877.

To the Editor of the Commercial:

In your paper of to-day a correspondent inquires as to the origin of the line, "Consistency's a jewel," which originally appeared in Murtagh's collection of English and Scotch ballads. In the ballad of "Jolly Robyn Roughhead" are the following lines:

"Tush! tush! my lassie! such thought resigne;
Comparisons are cruell,
Fine pictures suit in frames as fine,
A Consistency's a jewel.
For thee and me coarse clothes are best;
Rude forks in homelye raiment drest,
Wife Joan and goodman Robyn."

Yours respectfully, W. S. I.

FOREIGN MISCELLANY.

EXTRADITON WITH ENGLAND.

THE QUESTION UNDER DISCUSSION IN THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT—AN EXPLANATION BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

In the House of Lords, Tuesday, Feb. 13, Earl Granville said: "My Lords: I rise to put a question to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the Extradition treaty with the United States. Your lordships will remember that last year her Majesty's Government refused to surrender on extradition processes two men, named Winslow and Brett, unless the Government of the United States gave a distinct pledge that the person whose extradition was demanded should not be tried on any other charge than that in respect of which the extradition was granted. This was in consequence of a statement that a man named Lawrence, who had been already surrendered, was to be tried on a second charge. Since then one man has been surrendered; at least, is has been so states, and I believe the statement to be true. I should, therefore, like to know what were the conditions under which that surrender was made, or whether any conditions were required. If a satisfactory arrangement has been entered into, I rejoice sincerely at the conclusion of the affair, and I think both Governments deserve great credit for having, by a little common sense, extricated the two countries from what would have been a public scandal." [Hear, hear.]

The Earl of Derby in reply said: My lords: The noble earl has put to me a question which, although the papers on the subject are ready for presentation, and have, indeed, just been laid on the table, it may still be convenient to your lordships I should answer; it may also be desirable that I should explain in a few words the position in which this business actually stands. Your lordships will remember how the matter stood last year. The extradition of a man named Lawrence was demanded by the American Government on a charge made against him. His extradition was granted on that charge, and he was put on his trial in the United States. While he was about to be put on his trial, a representation was made to us that steps were being taken by the United States Government to put him on trial for another offense in the event of failure to obtain a conviction on the charge in respect of which the extradition had been granted. Now, as the man had not been surrendered on that second charge, that raised the question as to the construction to be placed on the treaty. We objected to the proceeding said to be contemplated by the United States Government, and that Government did not at the time deny the intention to put Lawrence on his trial in respect of the second charge; but they urged views in reference to the construction of the treaty which led to the correspondence between the two Governments, which your lordships will recollect, and which led to a discussion in this house. The result was that we and the Government of the United States held opposite views as to the construction of the treaty; but inasmuch as the claim on which we held they were not entitled to claim, and we felt bound to refuse to grant any further extraditions till the question should be settled, and so matters remained for some time. Meanwhile, the man Lawrence was tried for the offence on which his extradition had been granted. I am only aware what became of him; but at all events there was no second trial. However, in the month of August last we received through the American Minister a communication from the United States Government which, if it had been made before, would have saved a great deal of trouble. From this communication it appeared that, notwithstanding the representations which had been made on the subject, as far as the United States Government were concerned, no steps had been taken, or had been intended to be taken, with the view of putting Lawrence on his trial for the second offense. In other words, the Government of the United States claimed a right under the treaty which we did not admit the existence of, but they stated, and we did not doubt the accuracy of the statement, that they had not exercised, or attempted to exercise, the right they so claimed. That materially altered the position of affairs. We continued to maintain, and we maintain now, that the construction which we put on the treaty was the correct one, but from the information we obtained in August, and which, I repeat, it is a pity we had not obtained at an earlier date, it appeared that the question raised by the United States Government was purely theoretical—that is, they having raised a point which had not arisen in practice, we thought that the question might well remain in abeyance till it did arise in actual practice. [Hear, hear.] We were of the opinion that, in the circumstances really existing, there was no further occasion for suspending the operation of the treaty, and it remains now as it was before. Had steps been taken under it by the United States Government inconsistent with the view held by us, then we should have continued to feel that the treaty could only be renewed under the conditions suggested by us; but, as matters stood, we felt that those conditions were no longer required. [Hear, hear.] The arrangement between the two Governments continue as before that question was raised, pending the negotiations for a new treaty, which negotiations are now in progress. That is the whole case." [Hear, hear.]

AMERICANS AND THE NORTH POLE.

CAPT. HOWGATE'S PLAN BEFORE CONGRESS —WHAT IS THOUGHT OF IT ABROAD.

From the London Telegraph.

Americans seem determined to continue their friendly rivalry with us in the neutral field of Arctic exploration. Roused by the strictures passed on their Arctic explorers by Sir George Nares, Hon. Justice Daly, President of the Great Transatlantic Geographical Society, while paying the members of our recent Arctic Expedition many handsome compliments in his inaugural address, gives their Commander a dignified rebuke on account of his ungenerous references to the researches of his predecessors, Kane and Hayes. By way of testing the work done by the crews of the Alert and the Discovery, it appears that the organization of an American expedition is now being proposed to carry on the grand story of Polar adventure through Smith's Sound. Already a bill has been brought into Congress for that purpose, and men like Capt. Howgate, Dr. Hayes, and Prof. Loomis, the eminent meteorologist, and others, are advocating in the States renewed activity in the cause of Arctic discovery. It is gratifying to note that, in the discussion now going on in the American papers with reference to this subject, it is admitted that Sir George Nares has at least demonstrated the superiority of the Smith's Sound route over every other. It appears to be thought that, as he succeeded by following this channel in sailing a ship nearer the apex of the earth than any previous navigator—nearer by far than the most successful explorers were able to get by other passages—the superiority of the Smith's Sound route, long vindicated by Mr. C. R. Markham, has been strikingly verified. The Americans evidently consider that the chief success of the English expedition lies in showing that by attacking the Arctic mystery via Smith's Sound, the closest base of operations yet discovered is made available. By following this up, by taking a firmer grasp of the clue where it fell from the hands of the British expedition, it is thought that the coveted glory of planting the Stars and Stripes at the pole will be achieved. Of course all such anticipations are, we now know, over sanguine. The Americans, however, reason shrewdly and well in arguing that the channel by which Sir George Nares succeeded in sailing nearer to the pole than any of his predecessors must necessarily be the one that will be most certain to lead them with the greatest ease to the most valuable discoveries. Whether it will lead them to the pole is of course another question. It ought, however, to enable them to achieve what is nearly as grand a feat, that is, to determine how the mysterious continent of Greenland ends—a discovery which our explorers were on the verge of making when they gave up the glorious quest. We have little doubt that the officers of the British expedition will be among the first to bid the American Expedition "God speed," when it sails away into the icy North for the purpose of setting at rest all the acrid skepticism with which Sir George Nares' theory of a permanently unnavigable Palæocrystic Sea has been opposed.

A DIPLOMAT IN PLAIN DRESS.

The reporter of a London paper, describing the scene inside the House of Lords at the opening of Parliament, writes: "All this time a kaleidoscopic effect is visible through the open door of the Prince's chamber, the light in which, stronger than that struggling through our own storied windows, plays upon ever-shifting colors and figures. Gentlemen at Arms, with towering plumes, officers of Household Cavalry, now and then a foreign diplomatist, ablaze with orders, Peers in their robes, and officials of every imaginable description flit about, framed by the doorway, till the eye, weary of the glitter and confusion, turns away to rest on the more placid scene nearer at hand. At this moment occurs the first 'sensation' of the day. The masses of gay attire on the Peers' benches, before so still, not to say listless, break into life and movement, like a field of poppies blown upon by a sudden wind, while a very decided titter runs round the chamber. Looking for the cause, we see it in the appearance of the Chinese Ambassadors, who, wearing their State robes, with the vermilion button that mark their exalted rank, move toward the seats reserved for the diplomatic body. The celestial strangers can hardly be unconscious of the effect the y make, but, with perfect self-possession, not a muscle of their faces moving, they take their places, and begin calmly to inspect the scene. Simultaneously with the Embassy from the Flowery Land appears the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain, Lord Aveland, wearing the Windsor uniform, which is hereafter to be seen flitting about the place in laudable anxiety to make things pleasant all round. Lord Aveland has a hard time of it, for there is scarcely room and much an abundance of applicants that many an envious eye is directed to the Ambassadors' benches, where for a long while there seems space to spare. But even this sacred preserve gradually fills. The Russian Minister closely follows those of China, and is himself as closely followed by the representatives of Holland and Germany. But who may he be that, wearing that evening dress without star or ribbon, crosses the space in front of the throne, and presumes to seat himself among the bedizened diplomats? The question is easily answered by those who call to mind that when the great American Republic sends a civilian to represent her he must don the ordinary attire of a gentleman. Last year Gen. Schenck's uniform, simple though it was, blended harmoniously with that of his more magnificent colleagues. But the plain black of Mr. Pierrepont has an incongruous as well as distinctive effect upon which, however, it is likely that the chance American present looks with perfect complacency, if not with pride. Now come the Ministers of some South American States and Persia, and after them the first batch of Peers in their ungainly robes, headed by Lords Strathedon and Eversleigh."

EMANCIPATION DAY IN THE SOUTH.

THE WAY IT WAS CELEBRATED IN CHARLESTON—THE LADIES OUT IN FORCE—THE MILITARY PARADE—A COLORED GODDESS OF LIBERTY—A COLONEL'S FEARS.

The special correspondent of the London Times writes of the Emancipation Day celebration as follows: "The colored ladies turned out in great force and the highest spirits to do honor to the day, many of them wearing gay, gorgeous plumage, which makes a white woman look so ridiculous and vulgar, but in which the colored lady, either because it suits her complexion or because she has an instinct for arranging it, looks as much at home as a tropical bird. I am, of course, not speaking of the female aristocracy of the colored race, but of the 'lower middles.' The former would as soon wear anything gaudy, merely because it suited them, as a leader of ton in England would think of wearing for the same unfashionable reason last year's styles. I am told that some of the negro 'upper ten,' the colored crême de la crême, will not condescend to turn out at all to celebrate 'Emancipation Day,' caring, perhaps, as little to be reminded of the past degraded condition of their race as a retired tradesman cares to be reminded of the shop. I do not myself know enough of Charleston to say who were not there, but most certainly so many were there that it seemed to me as if the whole colored population had turned out. It had a very strange effect to find that the white population, on the other hand, had somehow mysteriously disappeared. The innocent Northerner, if just arrived, might easily have imagined that at last the downtrodden negro had turned, like the worm, had exterminated, or, with more congenial gentleness, had merely banished all his white oppressors, to the latest baby, and that the victorious army which had said that it was a deliverance was now marching in triumphal procession through rescued and grateful crowds.

For, as I need scarcely say, on this occasion, as on pretty nearly all occasions in commercial, peace-loving America, the principal feature of the day's celebration was a military parade. Whatever the white man does the black man, whose imitative talent no one of his strongest points does too. So we had, on Monday, a parade so much in the regulation style that I may safely leave it to the reader's imagination, merely reminding him that, in picturing to himself the usual accessories or 'properties,' the plumes, the gorgeous uniforms, the mounted Generals and Colonels, gracefully raising their cocked hats, the galloping aides and orderlies on curvetting, caracoling chargers, he must for white read black. It will doubtless be very hard for Europeans to believe this fact in the teeth of life-long associations, but nevertheless it is a fact that even that time-honored, inevitable adjunct of all military display, the brilliant staff, was black. Why, after all, prejudice and traditions apart, may not a staff, like a well-polished boot, be both black and brilliant? The very Goddess of Liberty, whom all the world over I had hitherto known as a blonde, usually over-rouged, was a charming little brunette. One must not describe a goddess too literally, while her attendant nymphs, mere mortals of whom the sole truth may be told, were some of them black as coal. She looked so well in her red cap, scarf, and rosettes, that a colored Goddess of Liberty would, I believe, soon become the rage in Europe, if Exeter Hall would only have the courage to introduce her. As for the parade itself, to a white man, seeing it for the first time, and all his life accustomed only to white parades, it was, of course, a very quaint spectacle to see the bowing Generals, the curvetting and caracoling aides, and 'brilliant staff' all in black, and it now and then cost me an effort to look as serious as the importance of the occasion and common politeness demanded. But this was merely the result of habit, and after a twelvemonth of black parades I should probably be struck by the absurdity of a white one. Indeed, I am inclined to think that, taken singly, the 'sable warriors,' like their wives, look, on the whole, less absurd in gorgeous costumes than white generals and aides; only that the civilized eye has grown reconciled to the absurdity of the last. I had a chat with one colored Colonel, who, from the magnificance of his uniform, and his being called to read the proclamation of Lincoln's emancipation order, was, I suppose, a personage of distinction; and he struck me as being not only very pleasant-mannered and gentlemanlike, but as also very intelligent and bright. He seemed at first somewhat uneasy at my presence. I was the only white man on the platform, and he naturally assumed that I was a member of the Democratic press, and his natural foe, but, on my informing him that I was neither a Democrat nor a Republican, but an Englishman, he appeared relieved, and confided to me the one drop of bitterness in the day's joyous cup. He had seen a Democratic artist sketching him, and feared he was going to be caricatured. He thought it hard that no Republican artist could be there to do justice to the parade, which he rightly considered a success. It was certainly a sufficiently clever imitation of white parades, and if some of the marching was bad, some of it, on the other hand, was very good. Nothing, too, could have been better than the behavior of the crowd, and though they kept the whole of the day a holiday, and naturally celebrated it in white fashion, by a good deal of whisky drinking, I am told the merriment was so far kept within bounds that the Police had not to make one arrest. I trust the colored Colonel's fears of being caricatured were groundless. It certainly would be cruelly unfair to caricature him in the hour, too, of his triumph, for he looked as well in his uniform as the late Duke of Wellington himself could have looked, and was to my thinking, a handsomer man than his Grace. I heard afterward that, like nearly all the other Colonels and Generals, he had been a slave, but, even before the war, had shown no much quickness and ability as to be given a post of some importance on, I believe, the railway. In saying that there was no white man in the procession I am speaking from the South Carolinian point of view. There were a few men whom I myself should have unhesitatingly pronounced to be pure whites, from an old Charlestonian, who was with me part of the time, assured me, from his own personal knowledge, that they ranked with the colored population. Out of the Southern States, if not, indeed, out of their own neighborhood, they might easily pass for white men, but here one drop of black blood is more carefully traced and registered than the old blue blood of Spain."

ROYALTY IN RICH DRESSES.

At the recent opening of Parliament in London the Queen wore a black velvet dress, with a long train trimmed with miniver and crape, and a long white tulle veil, surmounted by the crown in diamonds. Her Majesty also wore a necklace and earrings of large diamonds, the Koh-i-Noor as a brooch, the Riband and Star of the Order of the Garter, and the Victoria and Albert Order. Princess Louise wore a garnet velvet dress, trimmed with cream satin and steel. The jewelry worn by her royal Highness consisted of diamonds and pearls. Princess Beatrice wore a dress of Armure cardinal and fawn-colored poult de soie, trimmed with Brussels lace and embroidery of fawn-colored chenille, with red and bronze foliage. Head-dress—Diamond star, feather and veil. Ornaments—Necklace, earrings, and brooch of diamonds. Orders—The Ribbon and Star of St. Katherine of Russia, the Order of St. Isabelle of Portugal, the Victoria and Albert, and the Coburg and Gotha family Orders.

THE PENALTY OF KISSING A WIDOW.

The London of Feb. 10, (a conservative newspaper, the first number of which appeared Feb. 3,) has a department entitled "the Whispering Gallery," made up of items of rumor and of facts of more or less interest, and of which the following is a specimen: "A Glasgow widow has brought an action against a man for kissing her; the damages are laid at £500. Your widow is usually a retiring creature, but it is not often that she sets so high a price on her favors. In the present instance the exorbitancy is probably a mark of inconsolable affliction; a sign that the lady has retired from the business of matrimony; a sort of 'man-traps and spring-guns' announcement, warning all possible trespassers from this fair garden of viduity. It will probably succeed as it deserves. Your Scot is susceptible, but he is also thrifty. That it is not for everyone to go to Gretna is especially true north of the Tweed; and if things are always thus, it is no wonder."

AN INHUMAN HOUSE AGENT.

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "A cabinet-maker named Horner died one day last week in a street near Victoria Park, and an inquest on his body was held on Saturday. The deceased, according to the evidence of his wife, had been out of work for 16 weeks owing to illness, and was an out-patient of the Victoria Park Hospital. He had seven children, two of whom only brought in a trifle a week. The rest of the family got a little by making lucifer matches. A fortnight ago the landlady of the house they occupied left it, and on Tuesday last the house agent came and took the doors off and the windows out, although the deceased was dying. On Wednesday last he "tied over" the top of the chimney, so as to prevent them from having a fire, and nailed up the back door to prevent them from getting any water. He saw the deceased, who was then dying, but said he did not believe he was ill, but was of opinion that he was only shamming. On Wednesday there was no mistake as to the deceased's condition; for when the Parish Doctor came he found him dead, which was not surprising, as he had been without a fire since Saturday, and had been in the room with the windows out from 11 o'clock on Tuesday until he died the following day, Wednesday. The agent, who was called as a witness, admitted that on Tuesday morning he saw the deceased lying on some sacking, but did not believe him to be ill. He was not, as he explained, a 'medical man,' and therefore could not see if the deceased was ill; but had he known he was about to die he should have let the windows remain. The medical evidence showed that death was caused by disease of the lungs, and the jury returned a verdict accordingly, expressing an opinion that the conduct of the agent was inhuman, in which most people will probably agree."

Our Washington dispatches indicate a strong prospect that the count will go on rapidly from the moment of its renewal to-day. The Democratic extremists, who have heretofore enjoyed the aid of Mr. Randall, are dumfounded by that gentleman's desertion, which is said to have been caused by the discovery that his personal and political enemies were using him to the ruin of his own plans. Mr. David Dudley Field, whose natural thrift causes him to abhor the loss of all the fuss and fury he has expended on his revolutionary programme heretofore, still clings to the idea that a new election is a possible contingency, but he finds comparatively little support. He can certainly save himself any trouble about providing for the temporary occupancy of the White House, if a new election should be necessary. The Republicans are quite able to manage that interesting bit of business without his aid, should they be forced to do so. Meanwhile, South Carolina will probably go to the Commission this afternoon, and the necessity for arguing to throw out that State, in which their own committee admits the election of the Republican ticket, will be the climax of Democratic tribulation.

Two weeks from next Tuesday, March 13, New-Hampshire elects a Governor, various State officers, and three Congressmen. At last accounts the voters of the Granite State were more concerned to know who is to be President than who is to be Governor. The campaign has so far been conducted with little spirit on either side. The Republicans, however, are thought to have a more thorough organization than the Democrats. Moreover, they rely on the moral force and weight of a decision in favor of the Republican candidate for President more than on anything else. It is not strange, possibly, that both parties should look away from local issues to the grand result in the nation. This year, so far as we can see, there are no local questions at stake in New-Hampshire. Each party hopes for the triumph of its candidate. The Republicans, it is clear, were ready to give up whenever they found that Tilden was to be counted in. Now that that alarm is over, it is confidently expected that Prescott will carry the State by a handsome majority, and that two of the three Congressmen, at least, will be Republican.

There can be no question whatever as to the manliness and dignity of bearing which has characterized Mr. Hayes all through this peculiar and trying campaign. He has said nothing that was unbefitting his high position; he has never yet been compromised by any relative or agent whose proceedings made it necessary for him to disavow motives and intentions imputed to him. The little speech which the President-elect has just made at Fremont, Ohio, is thoroughly in keeping with all that he has heretofore said and done. It reminds us of the modest deference of Lincoln, who never made much of his calling, his office, or his surroundings, though he was always equal to every occasion thrust upon him, for Mr. Hayes, in his deprecatory manner of considering the possibilities before him, stands in sharp contrast to a man who may be said to have sought office with "uncommon anxiety."

One of the evidences of the imminence of a conflict in the East is an official statement from St. Petersburg contradicting the report that the Russian forces would cross the Pruth on the 28th of February. It is now asserted that no decisive steps will be taken until answers have been received to the Gortschakoff circular asking the great powers to define their attitude on the Eastern question. In other words, then, the 28th is too early a date to fix for the opening of active hostilities. The diplomatic correspondence referred to will require at least a couple of weeks. By the end of that time, unless new complications arise, Russia and Turkey will be face to face with war.

It is early for a Democratic organ to bolt a proposed party nomination in 1880. But a Tilden paper in Washington, commenting on the proposition to nominate Mr. Tilden for Democratic leader in the next Presidential campaign, takes occasion to deny that that eminent statesman has either fitness or claims for the position. Incidentally, this journal discloses the fact that the claimant agreed to pay the expenses of the Democratic campaign, in case he was nominated. This is a humiliating confession to make in behalf of any candidate. It also shows, however, that the Democrats are ready to admit that the bargain was not a good one for the party. Mr. Tilden brought that famous "barrel of money" into the fight, but he brought nothing else, though the Springfield Republican does insist that he "lifted his party" to a higher plane than it has heretofore occupied.

The conviction of three more of the infamous "Molly Maguires," in the Pennsylvania coal regions ought to go far toward assuring assassins and incendiaries that justice will finally overtake them. These men were convicted of murder in the first degree. The evidence showed that they encompassed the death of Rea after weeks of preparation and premeditation. If ever a homicide was deliberate and organized, it was his. The murderers, it seems certain, were selected by lot, and their hapless victim was marked for death long before he met his doom. The "Molly Maguires" are organized slayers. Their association is nothing less than a murderous conspiracy. It remains to be proved whether the laws of the State, fearlessly and rigorously executed, can effectually put an end to this system of American "Thugism."

WHAT CAN BE DONE IN THE SOUTH.

A good deal has been said lately of what the next Administration can and will do for the South. We believe that none of our readers will doubt our desire that everything shall be done for that section which can be done, and it is because of that desire that we shall try to guard against vague and unreasonable expectations. There is much which a new Republican Administration can undertake for the improvement of the South, which it would be a gross wrong to neglect and a great misfortune to fail in, and it is well that the public should make its demands strong and insist on the utmost effort to comply with them. But nothing will be gained by requiring impossibilities, or by overlooking the limitations which exist.

What the South needs to enable it to be as prosperous, orderly, and contented as it ought to be, may be roughly divided into what the Federal Government can do for it, what the Federal Government can do with Southern aid, and what the South must do for itself. What the Federal Government can do unaided is not likely to be controlling in the immediate future; but it is none the less important, and is an imperative duty. It consists almost solely in filling the Federal offices in the South wisely, with men of suitable character, ability, and standing. This is something which under any circumstances, without any qualification, must be done. It will be found a work both delicate and difficult, and it will take time; but it is absolutely essential. Under our present system, or under any which we can hope to have for the next four years, the Federal appointees will be essentially the most prominent political representatives of the Republican Party throughout the South. They ought, therefore, to be men in sympathy with the general ideas of the Republican Party, the essence of which is the maintenance of the civil and political rights of all citizens in good faith. It would be simple folly to waive or seem to waive that qualification for connection with the Federal service in any prominent position, because it would only lead to complete misapprehension of the spirit of the great majority of the people of the North who constitute the Republican Party. That condition being fulfilled, the Federal appointees ought to be men identified, by solid and permanent interests, and as far as possible by birth and social and other ties, with the portion of the country in which they are to exercise their functions. They should be men of unquestioned probity and capacity, and known to be such. They should not be office-seekers, and they should not be dependent, if it can be avoided, on their appointment for a livelihood. They should be held to a rigid accountability for the faithful conduct of their offices, and they should be required in all things to deal in a manner open and above-board, and scrupulously fair with all who have to do with them. The law should be their only guide, and anything like jobbery or political favoritism should cause their prompt removal. All these conditions should be observed wholly independent of what the sentiment or conduct of the South may be. It is a duty owed not to that section only, but to the country, and nothing can excuse its neglect.

It is obvious, however, that a great deal more can be done in this and in all other directions if a considerable and influential number of Southern men shall be found ready to co-operate with the Administration. It does not need that this co-operation shall involve adhesion to the Republican Party in all its policy or in local organization. It implies a resolution to give the party, as far as it has to do with the South, a fair trial, to treat its representatives with candor, to acknowledge their right conduct if it be right, and to avoid all occasion for the exertion of unusual powers by the Federal Government. If the Federal Administration, on its part, is to refrain, as it should, from all unnecessary interference with State affairs, the task will be easier and the result better if all occasion for interference of any kind is avoided. No administration can ignore the laws upon the statute-book; the country would not sustain it if it did; and the laws which make it the duty of the United States to secure the full and peaceful exercise of the right of suffrage in Federal elections are very definite as well as very just. They can only be made a dead letter if that right is frankly respected and that depends on the leaders of Southern opinion quite as much as it can upon the new President. If they show a sincere disposition to aid the Administration in avoiding all occurrences of a disturbing and irritating nature, the result will be comparatively certain and easy of attainment.

As to what the South can do for itself in opening up a brighter future, it is not necessary to speak now. We have heretofore expressed our views on this point with sufficient clearness. It is our expectation that the next four years will see a great change for the better in Southern prospects. We have strong hopes that the Federal Administration will be so conducted as to win the confidence of the progressive element in the South, and that this element will be found sufficiently powerful to bring about gradually but surely a new order of things. We do not anticipate any sudden change, and do not ignore the absolute necessity of time in the solution of the problem. But if, as is likely, all immediate occasion for violent passion can be avoided, and opportunity can be given for the operation of the conservative and quieting forces of social and commercial intercourse, and for the play of enlightened self-interest, we see no reason why progress should not be certain and steady.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The bill drafted at the Treasury Department to carry into effect the recommendations of the President for aiding the resumption of specie payments seems well suited to effect its object. We call attention to it here, not that we are so sanguine as to hope for any favorable action upon it at the present session, but because we think that the topic ought to be kept prominently before the public, and the desirability of retiring the surplus currency before actual resumption takes place made manifest to all. The bill provides for the issue of $150,000,000 in thirty-year four per cent. bonds in exchange for greenbacks at par, not more than $10,000,000 of which may be issued during any one month. The greenbacks thus funded are to be canceled and permanently retired. It is to be noted that the bonds are to be exchanged dollar for dollar for greenbacks, although they would doubtless command a slight premium if sold to the highest bidder. The bill accords with Mr. Chittenden's in this particular. The object, doubtless, is to avoid even the appearance of the Government's profiting by the depreciation of its own notes, as it might seem to do if they were received at less than par in exchange for the bonds. Undoubtedly, the prestige which the Government would thus gain would more than compensate for the slight loss which it might sustain by refusing to "shave" its own notes. As compared with the alternative plan of selling the bonds for gold and using the gold to redeem the greenbacks, there would be no loss by funding the greenbacks at par. The bonds would probably not command more than par in gold, and as the gold would be paid out dollar for dollar in exchange for greenbacks, the cost of resumption under the act as it stands would be precisely the same in this respect as under the proposed bill.

By another provision of the bill the Treasurer is required to retain one-half of the coin interest accruing from the date of the passage of the act to Jan. 1, 1879, on the bonds deposited with him to secure the circulation of national banks. On the latter date the reserved interest is to be transferred to the five per cent. redemption fund provided for by the act of June 20, 1874, which thereafter is to be maintained in coin, and the notes of the banks are to be redeemed in coin. The interest thus accruing will amount to something more than five per cent. of the bank circulation, so that by this simple plan the redemption fund will be transmuted into coin without cost or annoyance to the banks by which it is maintained. The maintenance of the redemption fund in coin or its equivalent after resumption day will not be a difficult task, since the greenbacks themselves will be the equivalent of coin in payments to the Government. If a bank shall send greenbacks instead of coin to make good its redemption deposit, the Treasurer must accept them, for the bank will be entitled to receive gold for them, and therefore, as between him and the bank, they will be to all intents and purposes coin.

And this brings us face to face with a fact which must not be overlooked or belittled, if specie payments are to be successfully established at the appointed time. The burden of resumption must be borne by the Government unaided. True, to make resumption complete the banks must resume at the same time that the Government resumes, but they will have the ever-ready resource of demanding gold from the Treasury in exchange for greenbacks whenever their notes are presented for payment. The Government will have no such resource. It will be, in effect, the ultimate redeemer of the whole circulation. The bank note rests on the greenback as the promise of the Government to pay coin. The whole burden of resumption, therefore, must ultimately fall on the shoulders of the Government. It is, then, doubly important that the fullest preparation should be made for specie payments—preparation so ample that no untoward accident or financial derangement can thwart the attempt to resume. Plainly, the best preparation which can be made, the surest means to make failure impossible, is to get the greenbacks out of the road. Once withdrawn and destroyed, they can never return to plague us. To accumulate coin to redeem them is a difficult and delicate process, which would be almost sure to cause derangement of the exchanges and financial disturbance. First, an immense stock of coin must be withdrawn from the commerce of the world and stored away idle in the vaults of the Treasury, awaiting the day of resumption; then, on the appointed day the flood-gates are to be opened and the reservoir of coin poured forth; and, finally, in order to bring the circulation within proper limits, the surplus coin must be sent abroad again. The setting free of so large a volume of gold will have all the effects for the time being of an inflation of the currency, and the exportation of the surplus will be accompanied by its necessary concomitant—the extravagant importation of foreign commodities. The bill wisely provides for avoiding all of these evils by disposing of the surplus greenbacks prior to resumption by funding them into bonds without the aid of gold at all.

The provision for the increase of the minor silver circulation to $80,000,000 is scarcely consistent with the objects of the bill, and is, moreover, superfluous. Silver has already become a drug in the vaults of the Treasury, and there is no occasion to further increase the stock of that already superabundant commodity. This provision is a concession to the Silver Ring which might well have been omitted. Aside from this, the bill is judiciously framed. One of these days we hope there may be a Congress wise enough to enact it into a law, and so to prepare the way for ridding the country of the train of evils that have followed the departure from the true standard of value.

The Liberals have begun their assault on the Government party in the English House of Lords, and the recent debate shows how it was met. The Tory leaders, Lord Derby, the Earl of Beaconsfield, and the Marquis of Salisbury, are obliged to admit that the conference has been substantially a failure, and that Turkey and Russia are, despite the exertions of the powers, on the verge of war. But they can very fairly put the practical question to their opponents: "What line of policy do you recommend?" If the Liberals urge the encouragement of internal reforms in Turkey, the Marquis of Salisbury can justly reply that this was precisely what he pressed upon the Turkish Government at the conference, and that they had already paved the way for thorough reform by conferring a remarkably liberal Constitution on the whole Empire. If, on the other hand, they urge "coercion," this means blockading Constantinople or bombarding the Turkish forts on the Bosphorus—a step for which the British public is by no means ready.

The British deputy to the conference admits, indeed, that the opposition of the Porte to the settlement urged by the powers was "mysterious," and thinks that the confidence of the Turks arose in some degree from the irresponsible reports they received of the disorganized condition of the Russian forces on the Pruth. Naturally, he does not admit—what the Liberal leaders will yet press home against the movement—that the Turkish obstinacy finally was only the natural close and effect of the previous British policy toward the Porte. By various methods, the Earl of Beaconsfield had unquestionably given the Ottoman Government the impression that the old relations between Great Britain and Turkey still existed as regards Russia. The almost criminal negligence of Sir Henry Elliott in regard to the Bulgarian atrocities, his own and Disraeli's apparent sympathies with the Porte, the public speeches of the latter, the presence of the British fleet in Besika Bay at a peculiar crisis, and the successful opposition of the English Cabinet to the Andrassy note and the Berlin memorandum, might well cause the Sultan and the whole governing class in Turkey to believe that the public and private sympathies of England were now, as they were in 1856, on the side of the Ottomans against the Russians. They could not be expected to understand the change in opinion, wrought in England by the Turkish barbarities in Bulgaria, nor the gradual conviction which has been created in Great Britain that the rule of Turkey in Europe is only a curse to its subjects, and ought, in some way, to be removed or controlled.

The Sultan, the Viziers, and the Pashas naturally thought the England of to-day was the same as in 1854. Disraeli's policy or utterances did not undeceive them. It was assumed that in the final struggle England would aid the Porte to hold Constantinople against her old rival in Asia, Russia. Then, too, the opinion, heralded by Cobden, that Russia was by no means so dangerous to India as was once supposed, and that the City of the Golden Horn was not at all so important to British interests as formerly, was not known or published abroad among the Mussulmans. The Tory Government, in its position to the Porte, did not represent the views of the modern British public. But this defect or failure of influence on the part of the Tories, is scarcely enough to give the Liberals a lever for overthrowing the Administration. The Government can point to the mission of Lord Salisbury as an indication of their honest efforts to restrain the Turks from war, and to the new Constitution and the retirement of Midhat Pasha, as an evidence that their efforts have had some fruit. They can deny, and undoubtedly will deny, any intention to support the Porte in its coming struggle with the Czar. Whatever purposes the Tory Administration may have had in the past, in regard to an alliance with Turkey, are quite given up now, on account of the great change in English opinion, and if war is to break out in a few weeks between Russia and Turkey, the opposition could not urge any other policy than the Tory leaders have adopted—that of rigid neutrality. Still, there can be no question that the Earl of Beaconsfield and his associates have quite separated themselves from the dominant British opinion, and that their position is, compared with that a year since, weak and insecure.

SUPPRESSION OF THE COOLIE TRADE.

Late advices received from Hong Kong state that the Chinese Government has at last decided upon a line of action that should have been adopted long ago, and will allow no more coolies to be shipped from China to Cuba. The importance of this injunction can be better understood when it is said that for the past twenty-five years there have been annual shipments of some eight or nine thousand of these laborers from Ostnou, Amoy, and other seaports of Southern China, and that the demand has been of late rather on the increase. Now, however, this traffic is to be summarily suppressed, and for reasons which have only to be simply stated to make their force apparent to every mind.

For years past there has been a more or less undefined belief that the coolie trade, as carried on between China and Peru, Cuba and various South American States, was little better than a slave trade in disguise. There was in China a semblance of legality given to it, from the fact that it was ostensibly under the immediate direction of the Government; but American and English merchants, whose vessels were chartered for the purpose of transporting this freight, were very quickly taught to look upon it as a form of business in which no honorable man could engage. No doubt the want of definite consular and diplomatic relations with foreign countries may have prevented the Chinese Government from coming to a clear understanding of the abuses to which these coolies were subjected, for it is only within four years that any effort has been made to investigate into the matter. In 1873, however, an Imperial Commission was appointed, consisting of three persons, a prominent Chinese official, an Englishman, and a Frenchman. This commission was instructed to examine into the state of the coolie trade, both in China and Cuba; to take testimony on the reported instances of cruelty and brutality, and to make such recommendation as to the regulation or suppression of the trade as might be deemed necessary. The report made by these Commissioners has recently been published, and presents such a terrible array of facts that it is not strange that the first steps toward their correction should be the complete abolition of the trade.

The Commissioners found that it was no easy matter to obtain the evidence they desired, although instances of gross abuse were matters of common notoriety. The coolies were under the charge of masters who were not backward in giving physical proof of their resentment, and the fear of punishment or death prevented many from making statements. But, in spite of this, about a thousand depositions were taken, and some eighty distinct petitions were received, supported by nearly two thousand signatures. In almost every instance it was shown, according to the official report, that the coolies "were brought by fraud or violence to be sold, and whether of age or minors, either received no contracts or were entrapped into accepting them, or constrained by force to sign them." Illustrated circulars were sent out on which the character of the work they were expected to perform was depicted. One of these represented several negroes toiling in the fields, while under the shade of a tree, and very much at his ease, sat a Chinaman, who was acting as overseer. This might be defended as on a par with the prospectus of a Western railroad; but the results in the former case were more disastrous than the mere loss of money. Once inside the baracoon, the doom of the coolie was sealed. The slightest attempt at escape or show of unwillingness to sign the contract was visited by punishment so severe that it often ended in death. What the sufferings were that these poor men were called on to endure in making the trip to Cuba, may be judged from the statement that, in a sea voyage of about three months' duration, the average rate of mortality was as one to nine. Indeed, the report reads like a description of the horrors of the Middle Passage in the days of the slave trade.

The arrival in Cuba was by no means an abatement of misery. Here the coolies were exposed and sold, separately or in gangs, like so many cattle. The life on the plantation was rigorous in the extreme; during the sugar season the hours of labor lasted from 4 A. M. until midnight, and this, too, without a single day's intermission, and any attempt to rest was punished by merciless flogging. Under these circumstances, that instinctive clinging to life that is common to all created animals was greatly loosened, and suicides were of frequent occurrence. A favorite way of ending life seems to have been to jump into the sugar caldron. But even after death the poor Chinaman, whose reverence for a lifeless body amounts almost to worship, could not feel safe. His most sacred principles were shocked by witnessing, time after time, the exhumation of the bones of his dead countrymen from the shallow graves in which they were buried, and their mixture with those of horses and oxen for the purpose of refining sugar. Thus, neither in life or death did there appear to be any hope, and one can well believe the statistical record which shows that during the past twenty years fifty per cent. of all the coolies landed in Cuba died on the island. Whatever effect it may have on the price of sugar, every one, we think, will commend the action of the Chinese Government in suppressing this barbarous traffic, but we also hope that it is its intention to do something to relieve the miseries of the thirty thousand or more coolies who are still laboring and suffering under cruel taskmasters in the Ever Faithful Isle.

SERIAL STATUES.

There is a proverb which asserts with the customary dogmatism of its kind that half a loaf is better than no bread. Of course, it is not true, but, perhaps for that very reason, it is generally accepted as a household axiom. In point of fact, every man who has any experience of American eating-houses is well aware that in many cases half a loaf is worse than a total absence of the same quality of bread. Many an unhappy traveler who has eaten half, or even a quarter, of a loaf when stopping ten minutes for breakfast has perished miserably; whereas, had he abstained from the deadly bread, he might have lived to be comfortably smashed in the next railway collision.

The patriotic projectors of the scheme of erecting a colossal statue on Bedloe's Island are evidently familiar with the bread proverb, and believe that the principle underlying it is applicable to public statues. Since New-York has delayed to furnish money enough for the completion of the entire statue, it has been decided that a piece of a statue is better than no statue whatever. Accordingly one of the arms of the Bartholdi statue, with its accompanying hand, has been placed on a pedestal in Madison-square, where it has excited the warm admiration of the infants who infest the place. Thus, those persons who have already contributed money to the enterprise have the pleasure of knowing that their money has not been wasted. They have not been able to procure a whole statue, but they have ornamented the City with a nice large piece of the intended statue's arm. This is clearly better than no statue at all, and it will be readily admitted that the gigantic arm and hand which ornament the upper part of Madison-square are at least as beautiful as the gilt Seward which sits at the southern gate in the apparent act of collecting statistics of the number of nurses and children who pass its pedestal.

It is understood that just in proportion as money is furnished, other pieces of the statue of Liberty will be erected in the parks and squares of this City. It is proposed to erect the two legs of the statue at one of the entrances of the Central Park. Persons who pass between the shadows of those two Titanic legs will undoubtedly be filled with all sorts of lofty emotions, but it must be confessed that a pair of detached legs, having no connection with either a body or a skirt, will fail to satisfy those who insist that art should faithfully copy nature. It would probably be better to place the legs upside down in the middle of the Central Park lake. By a little stretch of the imagination, the spectator could then fancy that Liberty had drowned herself after learning that Cronin's vote was not to be counted. The position of the legs above the water would be entirely in keeping with the hypothesis that the head of Liberty was firmly buried in the mud at the bottom of the lake, and while the demands of art would thus be satisfied, the partially submerged legs would preach a powerful sermon to the juvenile mind upon the evils of drowning in a shallow and muddy pond.

Since one arm of the statue is already in Madison-square, the other arm ought to be placed in Union-square. The head would, of course, be allotted to the City Hall Park, where the boot-blacking youth of our City could climb among its brazen locks, and survey the imposing spectacle of a review of a regiment of Militia from the statue's eyes. Where to place the body, or rather the trunk, of Liberty, would be a question requiring careful consideration. Having neither arms, legs, nor head, it would not be easily recognized by rural visitors. Those who know that Mr. Conkling has a torso—a fact which an enthusiastic Washington correspondent has laid before the country—might mistake the fragment of a respectable bronze female for the Senator himself, while others would imagine it to be some new-fashioned steam-boiler. Perhaps the best plan would be to let it out to political committees to be used as a gigantic gong to summon voters to go to register themselves. Andy Garvey's famous bell, which formerly performed this service in behalf of the Democracy, has vanished, but the torso of Liberty, mounted on a large wagon and hammered by large Democrats with heavy sledge hammers, would prove even more noisy than the bell, and would, at the same time, beautifully remind the faithful that if they cared for liberty they must register under as many different names and from as many different residences as their imaginations could suggest. Of course, after the whole statue had thus been issued serially, so to speak, it could be bound together and republished in complete statue form at Bedloe's Island. Meanwhile, the public could enjoy it in sections, and the subscribers could have ocular demonstration that their money had not been thrown away. The advantages of this plan are so manifest that it is strange that they were not long ago perceived, and that all our public statues were not thus erected serially and by piecemeal.

It is not yet too late, however, to improve many of our most conspicuous statues by distributing them as the Bartholdi statute is to be distributed. There is the equestrian Washington in Union-square. How much good could be done by simply dividing that remarkable statue into a dozen or more different pieces—the smaller the better—and placing them in obscure localities in Mackerelville and the Sixth Ward! The bronze Lincoln might, in the same way, be divided into such small doses that the merest child could gaze upon one or two of them without feeling any emotions of horror or alarm. Mr. Seward's gilt trousers, when seen all at once, have a painful effect upon all but the strongest minds; but were those trousers to be divided among half a dozen localities, their power for evil would be gone. In fact, we have hardly a public statue which would not be improved by being distributed. Let us have an end of the unfair discrimination which permits a statue to be monopolized by one part of the City. Let Union-square share its Lincoln and Washington with every other square, and let Madison-square divide its Seward with suburban towns. In these cases half a statue is infinitely better than a whole one, and, like homeopathic medicine, its value varies inversely as the quantity of it which is exhibited at one and the same time.

SCHOOLS FOR COLORED CITIZENS.

The importance of securing education to the negroes has been made more manifest than ever before in the midst of the confusion that has prevailed in political affairs since the November elections. The question of what is being done to render them intelligent and capable has become a pressing one. The answer to it is that much is being done. The public schools, such as they are, are established and opened to them, in name at least, by the law. The schools have suffered much in the political crash, and are obstructed by the interference of the roughs who seem to control Southern politics, and would be likely to go down, so far as the negro is concerned, but for his irrepressible determination to learn. They are, moreover, supplemented by certain helps which the Confederate cross-road rulers cannot control, the influence of which will go far toward diffusing knowledge "where it will do the most good." These helps are given by the Church missionary schools, which nearly every leading denomination has established on a systematic plan throughout the Southern States.

The colored men are doing a great deal, according to their means, to help themselves in this matter. They show much liberality in their contributions and energy in their efforts to build up good schools for themselves. They sustain four large Church organizations and several smaller ones, through which their efforts are mainly directed. The African Methodist Episcopal Church, with about 200,000 members, last year contributed over $42,000 for purposes connected with education, literature, and missions. It has undertaken thirteen schools, of which five are already in successful operation. The principal one is Wilberforce University, near Xenia, Ohio. It is designed for a college of high rank; it has ten Professors and teachers, and property worth $65,251 48, and reports 600 students in the last four years. The schools at Atlanta, Ga.; Galveston, Texas; Washington County, Texas, and Cokesbury, S. C., make returns of seven teachers and about 380 scholars. Other schools are projected at Louisville, Ky.; Baton Rouge, La.; Greensboro, La.; Hagerstown, Md.; in Florida, Arkansas, and Tennessee, and a mission is to be established in Hayti.

The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, a body of about the same numbers as the African, is building up institutions for higher education at Fayetteville, N. C., and West Middletown, Penn. The Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, a Southern organization, with not quite a hundred thousand members, and only six years old, is building up a school for the education of ministers at Louisville, Ky., which it designs making its central university. It has also in hand the establishment of a school for the education of young women. It is helped and encouraged by the white Methodists, North and South. The Consolidated American Baptist Missionary Convention is a large organization of colored Baptists. Its people use the schools which the Northern white Baptists have opened in the South, and are trying to establish institutions of their own. The Conventions of Georgia and Alabama have determined to combine to erect a school at Atlanta, Georgia, in which they expect to be helped by the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, and the Alabama Convention has resolved to establish a theological class at Marion, in connection with Lincoln University, and to hold Ministers' Institutes in different parts of the State.

The leading part in the work done by the white Churches for the education of the colored people has been taken by those of the North. The Southern Churches observe the work approvingly, without apparent jealousy, help in it some, do some like work in their own way, and plead poverty as their excuse for not doing more. Some, as the Baptists, confessed early that they could not accomplish much in this matter, and invited their Northern brethren to go down and perform what was a manifest duty. Others were later in reconciling themselves to the situation.

The American Missionary Association (Congregational) expended during its last year $198,985 35 in its Southern work, and added 665 members to its 56 churches. It sustains fourteen high schools and colleges, some of which have gained a wide reputation, and six common schools; employs 147 teachers; has 6,175 pupils under instruction, and claims that seventy thousand pupils were taught during the last year by teachers who had been instructed in its higher institutions.

The Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church has in nine years spent $582,006 90 for purposes connected with colored education. It sustains thirteen high, normal, and Biblical schools, so placed as to have one in nearly every Southern State, and owns more than two hundred thousand dollars' worth of school property in the South. It raised and expended in its last year $58,204 75, supported sixty teachers, and taught over three thousand pupils, a majority of whom will preach or teach. It estimates that last year forty thousand children were taught by persons who had been instructed in its schools.

The American Baptist Home Missionary Society supports seven high-schools and colleges in the South, in which 926 students were taught in 1876. It also gives aid to the Southern Baptists and the (colored) Consolidated Missionary Convention, the value of which was handsomely acknowledged by their delegates as the last annual meeting of the society. The Southern Baptist (white) Convention in 1875 recommended the holding of Ministers' Institutes, under the direction of its Home Mission Board, for the instruction of colored ministers and the more intelligent colored brethren in doctrine, and advised that missionaries be appointed to the colored people whenever the means were afforded, and that their Sunday-schools be helped. These recommendations were repeated in 1876.

The Northern Presbyterian Church spends about sixty thousand dollars a year on its missions to the freedmen. It sustains five high schools in North and South Carolina, in which are 903 students; 39 day schools, with 65 teachers and 3,776 scholars, and 107 Sunday-schools, with 7,009 scholars. In the Southern Presbyterian Church special attention is given in many Presbyteries to evangelistic work among the colored people. The General Assembly has decided to establish an institution for the education of colored ministers at Tuscaloosa, Ala. The Reformed (Dutch) Church in America is doing its work for the colored people in cooperation with this body, and has made an appropriation in aid of its school at Tuscaloosa.

The United Presbyterian Church has opened a normal and mission training-school at Knoxville, Tenn., the institution beginning with a fund of $12,389. The Associate Reformed Synod of the South, a small but active body, is co-operating with it.

The Protestant Episcopal Church spent last year $14,266 38 on its missions to the colored people. It has normal and high schools at Raleigh, N. C., Petersburg, Va., and Charleston, S. C., which together have furnished 119 teachers to the general field and several smaller schools, which have also furnished their quota of teachers.

The Disciples of Christ, (or Campbellites,) have missions among the colored people in Kentucky, Alabama, Mississippi, and Texas. A Bible school has been in operation three years at Louisville, Ky. Some ten or twelve young men who have been instructed in it have since done good service as missionaries and teachers. Another school is projected in Mississippi, and a charter has been obtained for it. Local Bible schools for colored ministers are contemplated to be built up in as many Southern States as possible.

The Unitarians have been helping the African Methodist Episcopal Church with books and money. Bishop Payne, of the African Church, acknowledged at the last National Conference of Unitarian Churches that Wilberforce University had in eight years received $4,600 from two of their societies.

The Roman Catholics have begun to carry out a plan of general mission work among the colored people, but there is no definite report of the extent to which their operations have been prosecuted. Prof. Day, of Howard University, estimates that they have two hundred thousand colored children in their schools, or under their influence. The estimate seems a very wild one.

The schools are designed mainly for theological training. But such training presupposes competent literary qualification, and the schools are forced to confer this upon their pupils. Nearly all the schools give prominence to normal instruction. Their pupils expect to become teachers as well as preachers, and, in the aggregate, represent a strong force, which is or will be engaged in diffusing instruction among colored people in all quarters of the South. The fact of the capacity of the negroes for scholarship is no longer in dispute. They have proved themselves interested in study, quick to learn, and able to make a good use of their culture. The colored teachers are full of energy, they make the elevation of their race a matter of personal pride, and go out prepared to do all they can to promote it. If their work is not stopped by the White Leaguers, they will effect a great improvement in the intellectual and moral condition of the next generation of their people.

THE RIVERDALE DISTRICT.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

In your article of to-day, referring to a report by Mr. J. J. R. Croes and myself on the laying out of the Riverdale District of the new wards, you honor us so much at the expense of our official superiors and others that I must ask the favor of being allowed to say that our plan has met with all reasonable consideration. The Park Commissioners before taking action upon it have very properly given the property-owners chiefly interested an opportunity of examining it and expressing their views. It has been for seven weeks under discussion, always in a good spirit, and the debate has developed suggestions of value which we have been glad to adopt.

As to the head of our department, he was the first to urge the essential proposition which has obtained your favor, and remains its warm advocate.

BENEDICT DE SPINOSA.

A PANEGYRIC BY PROF. FELIX ADLER.

A LARGE AUDIENCE PRESENT IN STANDARD HALL—SPINOSA'S LIFE AND CHARACTER EULOGIZED—HIS EXCOMMUNICATION AT THE AMSTERDAM SYNAGOGUE—HIS TEACHINGS AND PHILOSOPHY—THE HIGH ESTEEM IN WHICH HE IS NOW HELD.

Standard Hall was well filled yesterday morning with a fashionably dressed audience, composed almost exclusively of Hebrews, to listen to Prof. Felix Adler's panegyric on Spinoza, it being the two hundredth anniversary of the latter's death. In front of the platform hung an old engraving of the philosopher framed in smilax and white pinks, and bearing the inscription:

BENEDICT DE SPINOSA.
Cui natura Deus rerum, cui cognitus ordo,
Hoc Spinoza statu conspiciendus erat.
Expressere viri faciem, sed pingue mentem
Zeuxidis artifices non valuere manus.
Illa vaget scripta, mi sublimis, tractat,
Hanc quicunque cunis noscere scripta lege.

A double wicker basket stood above, filled with cut lilies, carnation pinks, roses, wheat sprays, and other exotics. On either side was drooping ivy. Festoons of evergreens draped the outer edges. A potted lily occupied the right of the platform and a dwarf rubber-tree the left.

During a voluntary from the choir, which was an invocation to Memory, the Professor mounted the platform. He is a small, light-complexioned man, with short hair, and a small, full beard. He wore evening costume of black, with unpolished boots. He spoke slowly and very distinctly, without notes, and at times was very eloquent. After the singing he stepped forward and said that as the years roll by the great men whom the past has wronged are receiving their recompense. Two centuries ago, Spinoza was hounded down, and to-day he once more walks the earth, and men open wide their hearts to receive his memory and his name. "If thou can'st turn thine eyes, dilated with infinity," continued the speaker, reverently lifting his eyes, "Oh, mighty shade, upon this mundane sphere, thou wilt behold men nearer the truth, the obloquy dispelled from thy fame, and a new generation arisen who are thy work." Then resuming: On the day that Columbus set sail for America the Jews left Spain for exile. Many who could not reconcile themselves to parting from their home and country became devout Catholics outwardly, while in their hearts they remained faithful to the religion of their ancestors. Some of them were raised to high dignities in the Church, were made monks and prelates; but soon their fidelity was suspected, and the Inquisition began to hunt them down. Some perished miserably at the stake, and others spent years in loathsome dungeons. Those who had means made their escape and found security in distant lands. A great number of these fugitives received asylum in the free States of Holland. They enriched the country by their thrift, frugality, and enterprise. About the opening of the seventeenth century a considerable colony had collected in Amsterdam, and there in 1632 the son of Spanish Jews, Benedict de Spinoza, was born. In his early youth he was educated in the new school that the Jews had erected. He learned the mysteries of Hebrew law and the doctrines of the Old Testament. The subtle discussions of the Talmud gave edge to his mind. Lastly he studied philosophy under Mimonides and Obenezera, the first of whom sought to harmonize the teachings of Aristotle with the Bible, and signally failed, and the other was a confirmed skeptic, whose notes on the Bible have anticipated modern criticism, though he did not dare to present his meaning in a shape for the understanding of the vulgar. In all these studies young Spinosa showed astonishing proficiency, and so delighted his teachers that they destined him for the Jewish ministry. Subsequently he sought out Dr. Vandenenda, a teacher of liberal learning, and under his tutorship became a good classical Latin scholar and acquired a knowledge of geometry, physics, and the art of sketching. Then he took up the works of Descartes, whose metaphysical philosophy exerted a decided influence on his future. Descartes was then the leader of a new school. Weary with the discussions of scholastics, he took as his motto De omnibus dubitandum est, (it is necessary to doubt all things,) though he, too, did not venture to push his convictions to the utmost. Jordan Bruno also determined the bias of Spinoza's mind. Bruno it was who first proclaimed the teachings of Copernicus. He inculcated a species of Pantheism. He was burned in 1600. By these influences Spinoza's mind was widened. From the broad plane on which he stood he looked with derision upon the rites and practices of external religion. He absented himself from public worship, he neglected the synagogue, and there were even dark rumors that he had been seen to partake of forbidden food. At first the rabbis treated his case with great leniency, and it is even said that he was offered 1,000 florins a year if he would remain faithful. He declined in a spirit of ingratitude in deserting a religion which had done so much for him, and he well knew that he would be cut off from friends and kinsmen and wealth and honorable position. But he tells us in the introduction to a work that was long lost, and has been only recently proclaimed, that, contemplating all that was offered him on one hand and a career of life on the other, the shame and evils were nothing to him compared with the great good. He felt as one sick unto death having one sufficient balm toward which he must strive. A great commotion was raised against him in Amsterdam. One evening an assassin was set upon him, but—a fanatic low. The stroke of the stiletto was skillfully parried, and Spinosa suffered only a rent in his cloak. But the city was no longer safe for him. He fled, and was obliged to change his residence frequently, until at last he found a resting place at The Hague, where he remained until his death. In the meantime the leniency of the rabbis had changed to anger and rigor. It had been the pride of Judaism from the most ancient times that the widest tolerance was granted in matters of religion. They believed that the practice of religion was more essential than its theory. But persecution begets persecution. These Jews, fresh from the horrors of the Inquisition, themselves had imbibed from it cruelty.

THE EXCOMMUNICATION OF SPINOSA.

On the 27th of July, 1656, in the synagogue of Amsterdam, while the sacred ark was kept open, an edict of excommunication was solemnly pronounced against Spinosa, and Mortari, one of his former masters, read the decree. Prof. Adler here read a translation of the original document. It is in substance: "By decree of the angels and saints, and by consent of the holy God, Benedict de Spinosa is hereby cursed and excommunicated. May he be banned with the ban with which Joshua banned Jericho. May he be cursed as Elijah cursed the Jews. May he be accursed by day, and may he be accursed by night. May he be accursed when he lies down, and may he be accursed when he rises up. May he be accursed on his going forth, and may he be accursed on his coming in. May the Lord God refuse to pardon him. May His wrath and anger be kindled against him, and on him rest all the curses of the book and the law. May the Lord wipe out his name, and separate him from his kindred. May all the curses under the firmament light upon his writings. No one of the faithful shall communicate with him by words of mouth or by letter; nor shall any one show him favor; nor shall any one rest under the same roof with him; nor approach his person within four yards, nor read any writing written by him." When this was read to Spinosa, he replied: "They compel me to do nothing that I was not resolved of my own accord to fulfill." He retired into his silent chamber and lived in a world of his own. There by 20 years' toil he built up the mighty edifice of his system, whose simplicity, unity, and grandeur are the wonder of men. It is man's questioning spirit seeking to penetrate into the heart of nature, and to grasp the origin of things. The riddle remains unsolved despite many attempts; but who will solve it? Spinosa was the great philosopher of Pantheism. He taught that there is a unity in nature, and that under her thousand-formed changes there is somewhat unchangeable. In all her myriad hues and forms there is an undefinable substance, which is the uncreated, undivided, absolute, infinite God. Thought and extension are its attributes. It is one in all, and all in one. God is not matter, and cannot be ruined. He is that deeper unity in which mind and matter are one. God is nature. God is in the tree, the stone, the stars, in man. He does not love or labor for any specific purpose, but produces from the necessities of His being endless variety with ceaseless activity. His end is to cause all things, and all are as in nature, they partake of Him. Man also is of God. The essence of man is mind. He is a logical being. God alone has truth, and so far as man sees things clearly and truthfully he is of God. Logic is the basis of ethics. Spinosa ignores sentiment. He teaches that intellect alone is useful to follow the universal laws. Virtue is the pursuit of knowledge. There are three kinds of virtue—blurred perception, the light of reason, and the perception of the intellect. The last is the best. Virtue being whatever heightens enjoyment, the gratification of the appetites is good. The wise man delights in good food and comforts, but the true being is only in the intellect. That which is moral helps, and that which is immoral hinders, thought. Man is also a social being. The individual mind is exalted by congregated minds. He should hate evil at all times, for evil is a weakness of the powers of reason. He should reward hatred with love. Love is a sense of kinship in the common search for reason's goal, which is wisdom. All men should act as though they were no longer of one body and one mind. This, Spinosa says, is ideal life. He looks upon friendship as the dearest of earth's possessions, and he esteems wedlock as the holy union of two souls in the common search for truth. Man should be serene. He should fear, because it is the child of passion, and hope, because it is the child of desire. He should avoid humbleness, haughtiness, remorse, and pity. He should court stillness and be collected for reason's sake. When we come to know the passions that bind us to passing phenomena our nature is enabled to conquer our outward nature, and we become masters, free. Thus the emotional nature is extinguished and the man is freed from the restraints of the passions. He dwells in the intellect and grows into converse with God. Against the blows of misfortune reason steels us. When we know that all things are by necessity we will find tranquility in yielding to the inevitable. When the body passes away the mind does not wholly perish, but something remains that is infinite. Whether the mind be immortal or not, it is best to live by reason, for a man would be foolish to eat only deadly poison, because at times he cannot get healthy food. Religion and piety consist in living so as to conform to the necessities arising in the outward world, and that is intellectual love of God.

SPINOSA A TYPE OF THE INFINITE.

Such, said Prof. Adler, is a brief summary of Spinosa's system. Thus is seen this giant wrestling with nature for her secret, and the riddle remains unred. He errs, also, in turning aside from the world's manifold emotions. Emotions are not in themselves evil; nay, they are the seminal principle of all virtues. Spinosa's system towers on lofty pillars of rock, but it is devoid of color. It is impressive in its simple grandeur, but whatever momentary glow it has passes away quickly like the the reflection of the setting sun on the evening sky. His name marks a lofty peak in human history. He was a true man. No man more fully lived up to his teachings. He was an adept in natural sciences, understood the microscope and was a good optician. Miller has incorporated his book on Ethics into his Philosophy of Man, and Morrison, the English philosopher, at a later date, paid him an equally high compliment. As a religion, however, was opposed to every sort of superstition. He wrote against the false claims of the Bible. Miracles, he said, are past belief. He thought the beauty of Cosmos much more admirable. He demanded that the principles of natural sciences be applied to the Bible—each scientist to be separated from the rest, and the surrounding circumstances of the investigators to be considered. He wanted, in fact, a natural history of the Bible to be written. He asserted that the priests falsified the Bible, and he denied that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, which he claimed was written many centuries later. He pointed out the many discrepancies with which the Scriptures abound, and he included in it a magnificent plea for liberty of conscience and speech. Religion and piety, he said, the State must demand, but nothing hereafter should be known by that name but the practice of equity and healthful love. The theologians were fierce, and Christian curses were added to Jewish anathemas. His book was collected. Few have so suffered; few so triumphed. For days he did not leave his student's room. Those that knew him well revered him. His soul was pure; his character crystal. He was frugal, living on a few pence a day; yet he was not averse to others taking comfort. His sense of honor was scrupulously nice. Again and again he rejected pensions. He made his living by grinding lenses. In intercourse with the family of his landlord, a painter, he found the relief he needed. When an Electoral Palatinate offered him the Professorship of Metaphysics at Heidelburg he declined it, because there was a condition attached that he should teach philosophy as not to interfere with the established religion. He answered that he could only teach the truth as he saw it. Yet he was fearless, and when his life was again threatened he calmed his friends by his confidence. He had now reached his forty-fourth year. For 20 years he had been fighting a treacherous disease. This giant in intellect was a pallid consumptive. Yet no complaint ever crossed his lips. In the early part of 1677, in February, while the family of the painter was at church, only a single friend, the host, and one cat came. He passed away as calmly as he had lived in the stillness of a Sunday afternoon. He has left a name in history that will not pass away. The Christians and the Jews have cast him out, but he has won a nobler title than theirs—he belongs to all mankind. [Applause.] He was the helper of mankind. He taught men to calm their passions. It is a sacred hour when we read his Ethics and feel the calm of his soul come over our own. We enter into them as into a dark, ancient temple; but there is no idol there—only the spirit of truth that sanctifies him and us. A great man, he was a type of the infinite. So, more and more, as the light increases among men, he will be esteemed, and as the centuries elapse posterity will name him Benedictus, Benedictus.

Another voluntary by the choir followed. Prof. Adler, possibly by way of benediction, then announced that the subject for next Sunday would be "The Office of Priests," and the congregation dispersed.

A SWINDLER IN BALTIMORE.

ATTEMPT TO CHEAT A JEWELER OUT OF $600 WORTH OF DIAMONDS AND A WATCH—DETECTED IN THE OPERATION.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 25.—An attempt was made here on Saturday by a Philadelphia confidence man to swindle I. Janowitz, of No. 137 West Baltimore-street, out of two diamond rings and a handsome gold watch, in all valued at $600. He went to the jewelry store in the morning and examined the jewelry, but, before leaving, telling the clerk that he would call later, which he did, choosing the articles mentioned. A clerk was sent with the stranger to the Carrollton Hotel, in company with a detective. The swindler, evidently apprehending trouble, attempted to elude the detective and clerk after arriving at the hotel. He was at once arrested, and while being taken to the station house the officer noticed him throw some scraps of paper in the street. Upon picking them up and placing them together they represented two checks on New-York banks, one for $40 and the other for $300. A blank check was also found in his pocket on the West Side Bank of New-York. His name is George B. Woods, and from information received here, he is thought to be a notorious Philadelphia confidence man. He is now in custody.

IGLESIAS NOT TO COME TO NEW-YORK.

THE ARREST OF GEN. CORTINA.

MATAMOROS, Feb. 25—Via BROWNSVILLE, Tex., Feb. 25.—Gen. Canales, Governor of this State, entered this city to-day with about 1,000 men. It now appears that Gen. Cortina was arrested yesterday by Gen. Blanco, by the express order of Gen. Canales, ostensibly because Cortina had not obeyed orders from the General Government to go to the City of Mexico. Gen. Canales on his way here took from Cortina's ranch about 300 beeves and several hundred horses. It is the general impression that the entire property of Cortina will be confiscated. There has been a long-standing rivalry between Canales and Cortina as to the control of this State, and it is believed Canales will strip Cortina of his wealth and remove all his friends from official positions on this frontier, thereby disposing of what has heretofore been a powerful impediment to his entire political control of the State of Tamaulipas.

RECENT DEATHS.

THE LATE GEN. ANDREW W. DENISON.

PARTICULARS OF THE SUDDEN DEATH OF THIS ESTEEMED PUBLIC OFFICER—HIS MILITARY SERVICES—PREPARATIONS FOR THE FUNERAL.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 25.—Gen. Andrew W. Denison, Postmaster of Baltimore, died suddenly yesterday morning, of apoplexy, at the residence of his brother-in-law, Charles P. Montague, Esq., No. 249 North Charles-street. On Friday Gen. Denison was in good health and the best of spirits. He was at the Post Office during the day, and in course of a conversation with his assistant remarked that he "never felt better in his life." After spending some time at the office he went to his home at Mr. Montague's, where he partook of a hearty dinner and conversed with his sister, Mrs. Montague, until 10:30 P. M., when he retired. At 1 o'clock on Saturday morning his colored servant heard a movement in his room, and upon going thither found his master standing in the centre of the room. In answer to the inquiry of the servant he said that nothing was the matter at all, and he [the servant] need feel no alarm. The servant retired, and at 7:30, as is his custom, went to the General's room to assist him to dress. He carefully pulled down the bed-clothes and proceeded to put on the sleeper's stockings, but perceiving that the feet appeared limp, he called out, "Mars Denison; Oh, Mars Denison; is you sleep?" He received no answer, and becoming alarmed, ran to Mr. Montague's room, and told him that his brother-in-law had fainted. Mr. Montague hastened to the General's bedside to find him unconscious. Dr. Christopher Johnson was summoned immediately, and upon his arrival pronounced the General dead, and assigned apoplexy as the cause. Death had probably occurred about 6 o'clock.

Gen. Denison was the son of Marcus Denison, Esq., who, years ago, was a prominent merchant of this city. He was born in 1831, and consequently was 46 years old. At the beginning of the war he left his father's business, and joined the Union Army with a regiment of volunteers, which was raised in this city, as its colonel. This regiment—the Eighth—took the field Sept. 18, 1862, and went gallantly through the following battles: Maryland Heights, Funkstown, Wilderness, Laurel Hill, Spottsylvania, Harris' Farm, North Anna, Shady Grove, Bethesda Church, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, Weldon Railroad, Poplar Grove Church, Chapel House, Peeble's Farm, Hatcher's Run, Hicktord's, Dolney's Mill, White Oak Road, Five Forks, and Appomattax Court-house. In the Fall of 1863 Col. Denison took command of the Maryland Brigade instead of Gen. J. R. Kenley, still holding the rank of Colonel. On the 8th of May, 1864, while leading his forces at the battle of the Wilderness, he was struck in the right arm by a ball, which necessitated the amputation of the limb. For gallant conduct upon this occasion he was brevetted Brigadier General, the commission dating from Aug. 19, 1864. Soon after recovering from the effects of the amputation he was wounded in the left leg at the battle of White Oak Road, on March 31, 1865. Shortly after this event he was again wounded, when he was made Major General of volunteers, by brevet, for gallant conduct in the White Oak Road battle.

At the close of the war Gen. Denison returned to Baltimore, and took an active part in municipal politics. He was twice a candidate for Mayor, but was defeated. His successful opponent, Hon. John Lee Chapman, however, subsequently appointed him one of the Judges of the Appeal Tax Court. On the 19th of April, 1869, he was appointed Postmaster of the city by President Grant, and in 1873 was reappointed. The deceased took a keen interest in all the organizations that were formed serving to perpetuate friendly feeling toward soldiers who served in his brigade and at the time of his death was First Department Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic of Maryland. He was a member of Wilson Post, No. 1, and was also President of the Old City Guard and Maryland Line Associations. When the announcement of his death was made at the Post Office, yesterday morning, the officers in the department were shocked beyond measure, and received the painful tidings with expressions of deep sorrow. When his death was bulletined at the various newspaper offices, grief was expressed in the faces of the many citizens who read the announcement, irrespective of political proclivities. There was not a man in the City of Baltimore more generally beloved than the deceased gentleman. In the various positions of trust and honor which he has held, his name has always been clear of the slightest stain, and the faithful manner in which he discharged his duties has given general satisfaction, and drawn forth complimentary comment from the whole community. The rooms of the various organizations of which he was a member, also the Post Office, are to-day draped in mourning. Gen. Denison was unmarried. He leaves two brothers and two sisters—Lieut. David A. Denison, United States Army, now in Italy, and John M. Denison, Treasurer of the Post Office, and Mrs. Charles P. Montague, of this city, and Mrs. Russell, of Troy, N. Y. He also leaves an estate valued at $500,000. The funeral will take place tomorrow afternoon, Monday, from the residence of Mrs. Montague. The pall-bearers are: Gens. John R. Kenly, Charles E. Phelps, Felix Agnes, Adam E. King, Cols. E. H. Webster, E. F. M. Faehtly, Edward Wilkins, and J. S. Johannas. The Fifth and Sixth Regiments, Maryland National Guard, with the employes of the Post Office, and the bodies of the several societies, will attend the funeral. Mr. John B. Askew has assumed the duties of Postmaster, which position he will fill until another appointment is made.

GEN. BARON VON STEINWEHR.

Gen. A. Von Steinwehr, of Cincinnati, Ohio, died suddenly at the Tift House, Buffalo, yesterday afternoon. He was on his way to this City, where his son resides. Adolph Wilhelm August Friedrich Baron Von Steinwehr was born at Blankenburg, in the Duchy of Brunswick, Sept. 22, 1822. He was educated at the Military Academy of the City of Brunswick, and entered the Army of the Duchy as Lieutenant in 1841. In 1847 he resigned and came to the United States for the purpose of offering his services to the Government in the Mexican war, but, failing to obtain a commission in the Regular Army, he returned to Germany, after marrying a lady of Mobile. In 1854 he returned to this country and purchased a farm near Wallingford, Conn. At the commencement of the civil war he raised a regiment, the Twenty-ninth New-York Volunteers, which he commanded at the first battle of Bull Run, forming part of the reserve under Col. Miles. On Oct. 12, 1861, he was commissioned a Brigadier General and appointed to the command of the Second Brigade of Blenker's Division, which in May, 1862, was attached to the Mountain Department, under Gen. Fremont. When Sigel assumed command of the corps, after the organization of Pope's campaign, Gen. Steinwehr was promoted to the head of the Second Division, and participated in the campaign on the Rapidan and Rappahannock. He was one of the officers especially mentioned by Gen. Lee in the note to Gen. Halleck threatening retaliation for certain orders issued by Gen. Pope and certain acts committed by some of his subordinates. At the battle of Chancellorsville he commanded a division in Gen. Howard's Eleventh Corps. Gen. Von Steinwehr served with distinction till the close of the war.

RAILROAD AID IN MISSOURI.

A bill designed to facilitate the building of railroads in Missouri has been introduced in the State Legislature, and is thus summarized by the St. Louis Republican: "It authorizes railroad companies to receive subscriptions to be paid in either 'money, property, material or work,' and to issue in exchange therefore 'transportation stock,' redeemable in passenger fares or freight carriage. The certificates of stock are to be issued in sums of not less than one share each, and are to be a first lien on the road and its property, into whose hands soever they may come, except as to mortgages recorded in the counties through which the road runs before the making of such subscriptions. No mortgage of the road is to have preference over transportation stock subscribed before the record of the mortgage. The transportation stock certificates may be issued to persons severally or jointly, and are redeemable in the following manner: The certificates, drawing 6 per cent. interest, and transferable by indorsement, shall entitle the holder thereof to their face value with interest in service either in fares or freight charges at the usual rates, provided that the road may require one-half the freight bills or fares to be paid in cash, crediting the remainder on the certificate till the amount due and unpaid shall be less than one-eighth, after which no more cash may be exacted. The certificates entitle the holder to all the rights and privileges of a stockholder, but shall not subject him to any liability for the debts or obligations of the company."

Though just submitted, it brings the receipts and disbursements down to the close of the fiscal year, Oct. 31, 1876. The Agricultural College fund, $116,000, is invested in the bonds of the State, and the interest, amounting to $6,960, is appropriated to the support of Rutgers Scientific School.

THAT LOUISIANA ARTICLE.

The Columbus (Ohio) State Journal of Saturday says: "In the present emergency in the Electoral count Democratic ingenuity has been bent toward placing a construction unfavorable to the Republican interest on an article on Louisiana affairs appearing in the editorial columns of the State Journal of last Thursday morning, claiming that it appeared in the 'organ of Gov. Hayes,' edited by his friend Gen. Comly, and that the article was inspired by Gov. Hayes himself. On principle the State Journal advocated the election of Gov. Hayes, and believes in his election; but to our readers it is scarcely necessary to reiterate the statement that this paper is not the organ of Gov. Hayes, or any other man; and to the people who know Gov. Hayes it will readily occur that he is a man not likely to make use of a personal organ. His letter of acceptance has been accepted as the index of what he will do upon reaching the Presidential chair, and the State Journal has had no desire and no opportunity to supersede that admirable document as the mouthpiece of the Republican candidate. We say this much in the absence of Gen. Comly, who, during nearly the whole of this week has been confined to his house by serious illness, and who, so far from being able to perform any editorial duty whatever, has been strictly forbidden by his physicians to receive visitors or to read the newspapers or manuscripts. In view of the industrious proclamation in Washington yesterday of the story above alluded to, it is proper to state that Gov. Hayes did not, directly or remotely, inspire the article in question. He certainly knew nothing of its existence or of any intention to write such an article until after its appearance in print; and we learn that he did not read the article or know of its publication until his attention was called to it by a telegram from Washington yesterday."

THE DIFFERENCE IN FATHERS.

A local correspondent of the Boston Transcript writes: "One Sunday, in the absence of the teacher, I took charge of a class of boys of from 4 to 6 years of age. 'Speaking the truth' was the basis of our conversation together. I asked the boys if either of them could tell the story of George Washington and his little hatchet. One of the boys promptly began to tell the story, and was listened to most attentively by the dozen or more of the class. One little fellow, who had given the most careful attention, turning his head a little one side, his bright eyes snapping, and with a most determined expression upon his face, exclaimed, 'Well, Mr. B——, I don't care, my father had an oleander bush and I cut it down. He asked me if I did it. I told him I did—and he licked me.'"

GOV. HAYES' VIEWS.

The Philadelphia Ledger prints the subjoined extract from a private letter written by Gov. Hayes on the 20th of June last: "You know I am so decidedly hard money that while I don't have the highest opinion of the resumption act [that of Jan. 14, 1875,] as a practical measure, it would, in my opinion, be a step backward to repeal it, unless the repeal was coupled with the adoption of a better measure looking to a return to coin." * * * "As to the civil service, I incline to adopt your view; certainly I believe in the principle. But all this is under advisement, and in due time I will try to act wisely. Platforms and letters of candidates are not like character and record."

LOSSES BY FIRE.

THE BURNING OF FOX'S THEATRE.

THE FIRE IN PHILADELPHIA YESTERDAY MORNING—TOTAL LOSS OF NEARLY A QUARTER OF A MILLION DOLLARS—SEVERAL PERSONS BURIED BENEATH FALLING WALLS AND TIMBERS—VALUABLE BOOKS GREATLY DAMAGED BY WATER.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA, Sunday, Feb. 25, 1877.

The largest and most destructive fire which has visited this city for some time was that which destroyed Fox's New American Theatre this morning. The total loss by the burning of this and other buildings will amount to about $250,000. As announced in the telegraphic dispatches to THE TIMES, the fire was discovered about 12:20 o'clock in the vicinity of the property room. This apartment is said to be fire-proof, and what caused it is not known. Fortunately the audience, which was a large one, had left about an hour before, and all the attachés had retired, except the night watchman, Charles P. Charlton. He states that he discovered the fire, but the veteran circus man, Dan Gardner, contradicts this, and says that he saw the fire breaking out of the windows in the rear of the stage, and that he made an effort to get into the theatre. Charlton came to the door and asked him what was the matter, and immediately a volume of smoke rushed out enveloping both men. Charlton returned and endeavored to save something, but the flames seized upon the scenery, and he was overpowered. How he reached the street he knows not, but it is believed he crawled to the door, when some of the spectators pulled him out. In a few minutes the entire building was in flames. A stiff southwest wind carried the lighted cinders to the roofs of the buildings toward Tenth-street, where they struck the high walls of the Mutual Life Insurance building at the corner of Tenth and Chestnut streets, and in a perfect shower fell upon the roof of the carriage manufactory of W. D. Rodgers & Co. This four-story structure was soon burned. A number of firemen were engaged in saving carriages on the first floor, when, without a second's warning, the roof and upper floors gave away, and fell to the cellar, carrying everything with it. Among the firemen buried were, George Bonaffon, Secretary of the Insurance Patrol, and George Frederick Newman, a member of the Patrol, were buried in the ruins. Thompson and Bonaffon were rescued, the former being severely cut in the head, and it is feared his skull is fractured. Bonaffon was injured on the head and sustained severe internal injuries. Newman was buried completely and remained under the smoldering mass for eight hours, being rescued about noon to-day in an unconscious condition. He was removed to the Pennsylvania Hospital, where an examination did not reveal any severe internal injuries, although he was badly burned. It is not known whether any others are under the ruins.

About 4 o'clock the rear wall of the theatre fell, burying three firemen, who were afterward rescued. The Mercantile Library, the largest in the city, in the rear was also damaged by fire and water. The elements made inroads on the most valuable collections in the building, and among the books destroyed is a copy of Audubon's Birds of America, worth about $900, and many rare and curious volumes. The books in the political economy, scientific and medical, and law departments, to the number of about 6,000, are so badly injured by water that they will have to be rebound. The loss to the library is supposed to be about $50,000, which is fully covered by insurance.

Fox's Theatre is a complete wreck. It was built in 1870, and was insured for $80,000. There is a heavy mortgage upon it, held by the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society, and the place has been for sale for a year without a purchaser. "The Waifs of New-York" was the attraction last week, while the Zanfretta Troupe were to have opened to-morrow night. The actors and actresses lost all their wardrobes, the only things saved being three trunks belonging to Zanfretta. He lost four others, the contents of which he says were valued at about $4,000. The members of the theatrical company who lost their stocks were W. H. Danvers, Ted Hilner, Mrs. Addie Johnson, Miss Lena Gordon, Miss Agnes Martin, Miss Myers, Paul Beyer, John Forbes, T. E. Jackson, Miss Cora Lee, and Miss Alice Sheldon. John Britner and Lewis Miller, the leaders of the orchestra, lost all their music and musical instruments, among which was a violin said to be valued at $800. The rest are unknown.

Mr. Fox is at his residence in this City, confined to his bed. This is the second time he has met with such a reverse. When he had the American Theatre, on Walnut-street, near Eighth, it was destroyed by fire, on the night of June 19, 1867, while the "Black Crook" was being performed. At that time 13 persons were killed by falling wall. The theatre just destroyed was opened on the night of Dec. 17, 1870, and was on the site formerly occupied by the Academy of Fine Arts. This is the twentieth amusement hall which has been destroyed by fire in this city. W. D. Rodgers & Co. are insured for $65,000. The senior partner of this firm is also ill at his residence, and is not expected to recover.

FIRES ELSEWHERE.

At about 11 o'clock, on Saturday night, flames were discovered in the eastern corner of the second and four-story building of Crane & Co.'s saddlery hardware factory, on Mulberry, near Mechanic-street, Newark. An alarm was at once sounded, but the flames spread with such rapidity that before they could be extinguished the building had been almost wholly gutted. The firm lose on their stock about $20,000; insured in the Citizens and Humboldt, of New-York; Franklin, Delaware, Hope, and Hartford, the Orient, the Royal, of London, and other companies. The damage to the building was in the neighborhood of $6,000. The cause of the fire is not known, but incendiarism is suspected.

At 8:30 o'clock yesterday morning a fire broke out on the second floor of the two-story building No. 353 Adams-street, Brooklyn, from an overheated stove. The building is owned by James Howell, who occupied the first floor as an iron-railing factory. His loss amounts to about $1,000, fully insured. The second floor was occupied by John S. Leese, manufacturer of ladies' suits, whose loss on machinery and stock amounts to $18,000, which is more than covered by insurance in the following companies: Commercial, $2,600; Westchester, $2,600; St. Nicholas, $3,000; New-York Produce, $2,500; Guaranty, $2,500; Adriatic, $2,500, and Royal Canada, $1,850.

Pierce & Tyler's block at Athol, Mass., was burned on Saturday afternoon. Loss on building, $6,300; insurance, $5,000. Joseph Pierce's loss on furniture and stock, $5,000; uninsured; Tyler & Shumway, merchants, lose $1,300; insurance, $1,000.

A fire which broke out on the first floor of No. 116 Maiden lane, last evening, damaged the stock and fixtures of the New-York City Oil Company to the extent of $800. The building was slightly damaged.

THE PULPIT.

TALMAGE AS AN INSURANCE AGENT.

HE URGES ALL MEN TO INSURE THEIR LIVES —PHARAOH'S DREAM AND ITS RESULTS —THE NEEDS AND TEMPTATIONS OF INSURANCE MEN.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage preached a sermon yesterday morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle to "Insurance People," taking his text from Genesis, forty-first chapter, thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth verses: "Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years. And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities." These, said Mr. Talmage, were the words of Joseph, the President of the first life insurance company that the world ever saw. Pharaoh had a dream that nearly distracted him. He dreamed that he stood on the banks of the Nile and saw seven fat, sleek cows come up out of the river, and they began at once to browse in the thick grass. There was nothing startling about that, but immediately after them came seven gaunt, lean cows, that ate their fat predecessors. Pharaoh sent for Joseph, and he interpreted the dream, telling him that there would be seven years of plenty, followed by seven years of famine, and it having been decided to gather in the food of the plenteous years, Joseph was made President of the undertaking. In every city, the preacher said, there were branch houses of this great Egyptian Life Insurance Company. It had in it all the advantages of the "life policy" plan, the "endowment plan," the "tontine plan," and all the other good plans. It had been stated that an English clergyman had started the first life insurance company, but this was not so—the institution was as old as the Egyptian corn-hills.

There was at the present time a great outcry against life insurance companies, which was occasioned by the failure of a few, and it was time for the pulpit to speak out on the subject. There was a great agitation. On every side was heard talk of insolvent trust corporations, the appointment of Receivers to wind them up, and the action of Grand Juries indicting dishonest officials. It was, in the opinion of the speaker, an effort to create a panic among the insurance companies, and would result in disaster to all. "Now," said Mr. Talmage, "against this life insurance panic, in the name of God and society, I protest." The institution is a good one, and not only in this but in all classes of business there are failures; 98 out of every 100 business men fail, and should they, merely because of the failure of three or four badly managed companies, endeavor to destroy totally one of the finest institutions in the world? Mr. Talmage then volunteered a statement as to the amount of death losses which had been paid by life insurance companies, and said they now stood ready to pay over to the bereft $2,000,000,000 more if called upon to do so. The man who would create a panic because one or two of these companies failed, was as bad as one who would burn down a thousand acres of wheat or blow up a ship for the purpose of destroying the barnacles on the bottom. He then called the attention of his hearers to the words of Paul in his first Epistle to Timothy, fifth chapter, eighth verse, "But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." A man who did not provide for the support of his family after his death, he continued, was, as Paul had said, worse even than an infidel. A man should provide for his family, and should hold a life policy in some good company that would, after his death, give support to them. He should not deceive them with deeds on Western lands that would yield nothing but chills and fever, nor leave them notes that had been outlawed or mortgages that were useless. If he was able to pay the premium on a policy, it was a mean thing for him to go up to heaven while they went into the poor-house. Some would say, "Oh, I have more faith than you; I believe God will provide for my family." Mr. Talmage then extended an invitation to his hearers to go with him to Blackwell's Island or to any of the poor-houses in the land, and said he would show them how these people were provided for. Yes, God would provide for them through public charity, but for his [the speaker's] part, he would rather see his family provided for in a private home. There was many a man who died wealthy, and yet who was insolvent before he was buried, because of litigations in regard to his fortune. The auctioneer's hammer would knock the life out of an estate quicker than anything else the preacher knew of. Life insurance would prevent all this, and his family would be cared for. Mr. Talmage pathetically said he could see around him men who urged that they were some day going to attend to this Christian duty, but did they know how long they were going to live? To-morrow might be too late, and their families would then be left uncared for. Mr. Talmage spoke at some length concerning the trust reposed in men engaged in life insurance business and the temptations to which they were continually exposed, and urged them to ask God's help when they were tempted. But if they belonged to that class of men who, without money, start what they call a life insurance company with a pretended capital of $200,000 or $300,000, then book themselves for all the large salaries or pensions and take all the premium for themselves, they had better get out of the business and disgorge the houses and lands of the widows and orphans which they had swallowed. He then told the fire insurance men that they were ordained of God to stand between the people and the most fearful of the elements, and that their actions contradicted the assertion that corporations have no souls.

A PASTOR'S FAREWELL.

REV. EMORY J. HAYNES, OF BROOKLYN, ANNOUNCES HIS CONVERSION FROM METHODISM TO THE BAPTIST FAITH.

The fact that Rev. Emory J. Haynes, Pastor of the Seventh Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, in Brooklyn, has resolved to enter the Baptist denomination has excited considerable interest, and the announcement that he would yesterday preach for the last time in the Seventh Avenue Church caused a very full attendance, especially at the morning service, when he made a formal statement in reference to the cause of his departure from the Methodist Church. In the opening prayer he invoked a blessing on all sects of the Protestant church, and expressed a fervent hope that they might so work for the same end as to be one in Christ Jesus. He also prayed earnestly for all writers for the press, and for a peaceful and happy result of the Presidential question. In reading notices he said there would be the usual meetings during the week, except that of the Pastor's class; and he announced that Rev. Prof. William North Rice, of Middletown, Conn., would preach next Sunday morning and evening, and that other ministers would officiate until the conference, which meets in April, appointed a regular pastor. His sermon, which was brief, was on the subject of "Spiritual Food." He said that for the development of a thoroughly Christian life it was necessary to bear the cross not only with fortitude, but with grace. Conversion was only the initiatory step in a Christian's career, and was frequently attended with such joyful experiences as to lead the convert to believe that he was about entering on a millenial period, in which there would be no sorrow; but he soon became undecided and found that the spiritual food was not all manna, and that if he would wear the crown he must, like Jesus, bear the cross.

After dwelling a short time on these points, and giving some familiar illustrations of the trials and triumphs of a truly Christian life, Mr. Haynes broke off somewhat abruptly; and, apparently, with deep feeling, said that the congregation were all, doubtless, expecting him to say something in relation to the question of his separation from them. So great had been his struggle in trying to arrive at a just conclusion, that he had little power left to utter the words he desired to speak. He was under great restraint in one point of view. He stood, by courtesy, in a Methodist pulpit, and it would be discourteous for him, under such circumstances, to endeavor to impress upon his hearers the cogency of some of his reasons for abandoning the Methodist denomination. It was enough for him to say that he had reached the position he now occupied after a prayerful struggle. The subject of the periodical change of the pastoral relation was a fixed policy of the Methodist Church. It had become with him a matter of conscience to be a laborer in one church longer than the three years allowed by the Methodist denomination. He was satisfied for himself, as the result of experience, that he could thus become more useful and work with a more contented mind. When he had come to this conclusion, there were only two ways for him to act; one was to endeavor to convert his congregation to his way of thinking, and thus become a disturber; and the other was the one he thought was the better plan, to say honestly what he thought, and go to those who were of the same opinion as himself. He had for some time thought over the question of whether it was best to administer the sacrament of baptism to those so young as not to be susceptible of its intent or purpose. He did not mean in saying this to pass judgment on any such. When he had come to the conclusion that he could not continue his connection with the Methodist Church, it became a question as to the time of the severance of that connection. He had either to remain up to the end of the year and then declare that he had changed, or else ask now to be released, and he thought the latter the better course. He had communicated his intention to the Presiding Elder of the District, who had in turn communicated it to the official board, and his resignation had been kindly received both by the board and the church, between whom and himself there existed nothing but good will and tenderness. His lineage was of the Methodist Church, he was converted in its sanctuary, and he had labored hard in its fold. He had difficulty to repress his feelings and find speech adequate to convey to the congregation the great love he bore them, and he hoped to show them hereafter that he was their brother still. Might God bless them all, and might they all in another world, in the clear light of eternal life, be reunited to sing praises before the Great Jehovah's throne. As Mr. Haynes closed tears coursed down his cheeks, and many in the congregation appeared overcome with emotion.

Mr. Haynes, on being asked whether he had received a call from the Washington Avenue Baptist Church, said he had not as yet received a formal call, and did not know positively whether he should. He would preach there, however, morning and evening on Sunday, March 11. Mr. Haynes will be baptized by immersion before accepting any call to act as Pastor of a Baptist Church, and the ceremony will probably take place next Sunday.

THE FUTURE WORLD.

ITS EXISTENCE AND NATURE—THE SWEDENBORGIAN FAITH FURTHER EXPLAINED BY REV. CHAUNCEY GILES.

Rev. Chauncey Giles preached last evening at the Church of the New Jerusalem, Thirty-fifth-street, between Park and Lexington avenues, upon "The Existence and Nature of the Future World." The church was crowded to its utmost capacity, and the reverend gentleman's remarks were listened to throughout with marked attention.

The greatest obstacle, he said, to the discussion of this question was the fact that the majority of men had already made up their minds on the subject, and the very claim of the new church to an insight into the mysteries of the future operated against the impartial examination of that claim. And yet it was a subject of most momentous importance. If any man in this City were to convince thoughtful people that he had discovered something of importance in regard to the future life, and were to advertise that he would relate it publicly, not 50 Hippodromes would hold the throngs which would rush to hear him. He, the speaker, not only believed in a future world, but in a future world with a substantiality—a geography so to speak. It was his purpose to show that everything in the material world, everything in the Bible, demanded a substantial spiritual world, which would be to the spiritual man what the earth was to its present inhabitants. If man survived dissolution he must exist somewhere. He could not live in a material world, because that was foreign to his nature. If he exists anywhere it must be in a world of the same nature and substance as himself. There was no escaping this conclusion. Why was it absurd to suppose that the same power which created the universe out of nothing could create a spiritual substance as much more refined than air as air was more refined than granite? The difference between wind and water was not much greater than that existing between granite and the atmosphere, or between light and water. Did any one understand how God created the universe with all its countless adaptability of form and beauty? It was just as natural and proper for a blind man to deny the existence of light as it was for men to insist that there was no future life because they were unable to penetrate into its existence by material faculties. Ignorance was never a good ground to reason from. It was no refutation to say that an object did not exist because it was not apparent to the material senses. One of the first principles of physical philosophy was the inertia of matter—that it could not move or act of itself if not first acted upon. It was a mistake to suppose that all the materials which went to make up the universe were self-acting, and that they only needed to exist to produce certain forms and results. The essence of power was below the surface. It was an indefinable substance, which was not material, and which had so far eluded search. A kindred reason for belonging to a spiritual world was the exquisite design everywhere manifest in nature. Fish were provided for the water, for animals for the land, the birds for the air—on all hands this perfect and refined adaptation of means to ends—all testified that nothing had been created without some definite purpose. The soul or man with its inner consciousness of future existence, its lofty aspirations, and its yearnings after the infinite, was it possible to suppose that it had been called into existence for nothing? The animals who have no souls are contented with a purely animal career; they can comprehend nothing more, and their sphere of action is limited strictly to their natural lives. But man is never contented, never satisfied. No matter how great his power or wealth, something more is necessary—something of a higher and nobler type, and which an earthly existence can never supply. It could not be that the Almighty, who had called into being every desire and faculty for some destined end, had intended all this for nothing. Then as to the proof furnished by the Bible itself. It tells us repeatedly of men who have had their spiritual natures opened to a comprehension of what was going on in the spiritual world. Ezekiel, Daniel, and other prophets possessed this power, and the Book of Revelations was an evidence that it had also been afforded to John. Certain modern Christians sought to explain away the force and meaning of the last-named book by saying that it was only figurative and was not intended to be taken literally. This same class tried to get around the difficulty of spirits by explaining that they had no substance or form, but only existed in essence. What sort of an existence was that? What would people think of an astronomer who announced that he had discovered a new planet, but that it had neither form nor substance? That would be absolutely no form and no substance was nothing. The whole Bible showed conclusively the existence of a spiritual world, with both form and substance. The reason that it often appeared distorted and incomprehensible was the fact that it had only been seen in glimpses. If there was not a spiritual world of the kind described in Revelation, with golden pavements, the tree for the healing of nations, the river of life, and the other living features described so circumstantially and positively by the Apostle, then the Bible was the most meaningless book in the world. It there was not a future existence then it was the most stupendous fraud in human history, and the good and great men who had wrought in the Church had but lent themselves to the promulgation of a lie. If there was no future state, then not only Christianity and the Bible, but the Koran, the Veda, and every other religious authority and system had for ages been trying to terrify men with false threats and encourage him with false hopes. This would be a miracle greater than anything recorded in the Scriptures, and only when it was found that darkness led to light and death begat life would he [the speaker] accept it.

Rev. Mr. Giles will deliver a discourse next Sunday evening upon the social organization and life of the future world.

THE FLOATING CHURCH.

CONFIRMATION AND ORDINATION SERVICES IN THE CHURCH OF OUR SAVIOUR.

The combined confirmation and ordination services at the Free Episcopal Church of Our Saviour, yesterday, attracted a large audience to the neat little floating church at the foot of Pike-street, East River. This mission, which is maintained for the benefit of seamen, can truly be said to be one of the most useful and deserving in this religiously neglected quarter of the City. That its benefits are thoroughly appreciated by those for whom it is designed was demonstrated yesterday by the congregation assembled within its walls, three-fourths of whom were seamen of all grades and classes, whose close attention to and hearty participation in the service was one of the most pleasant features of the occasion. Morning prayer was said at 9 o'clock by the minister of the parish, Rev. R. J. Walker, and at 10:30 Bishop Potter preached a sermon upon the duties and responsibilities of the priesthood. The Litany was read by Rev. Dr. George F. Seymour, after which the service for the ordination of priests and deacons was conducted by the Bishop. Two new clergymen were ordained—Matthew A. Bailey, M. D., to the office of Deacon, and Rev. Isaac McGoure to that of priest. Two other clergymen, also participated in the services—Rev. Dr. Oliver, of the General Theological Seminary, and Rev. Mr. Wells, of West Point. The most impressive ceremony of the morning was the confirmation service, in which a class of 24, two thirds of whom were seamen of all ranks, from mate down to cabin-boy, were confirmed by the Bishop. All the members of the class, particularly the sailors, manifested a deep and heartfelt interest in the vows which they took upon them, and appeared fully impressed with the solemnity and importance of the act in which they were engaged. After the ceremony of the laying on of hands had been concluded, the venerable Bishop addressed a few words of counsel to the new converts, admonishing them of the difficulties of the faith they had chosen to follow, and at the same time bidding them God speed upon their journey. The Holy Communion was administered to about 100 persons.

The Church of our Savior has long been quietly and without ostentation doing a noble work in the reclamation of the poor and neglected classes, and richly merits the confidence and support of all who desire to aid in elevating and improving both the transient and permanent population of the East River water-front. Services are held at the church every Sunday morning at 10:30 o'clock, and at 3 in the afternoon. A Wednesday evening temperance meeting and a Friday evening lecture are held weekly at the residence of the minister, Rev. R. J. Walker, No. 34 Pike-street. A free reading room is open every afternoon from 4 o'clock till 10 in the basement of the same building. Bibles, testaments, books, and papers in different languages are also given to seamen and boatmen at the close of the afternoon Sunday service in the church.

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

THE HOME FOR AGED HEBREWS.

ANNUAL PURIM RECEPTION OF THE LADY MANAGERS—THE HOME AS IT IS NOW CONDUCTED—A LARGE NUMBER OF VISITORS.

The annual Purim reception of the lady managers of the Home for Aged and Infirm Hebrews was held yesterday at the Home, Eighty-seventh-street and Avenue A, and notwithstanding the uninviting character of the weather, was attended by a large number of leading Hebrew citizens. The retreat chosen for the resting place of indigent Hebrews is one of the most delightful in the City, and possesses unusual sanitary advantages. The house was originally one of the country residences of the Astor family, and is situated on an eminence from which delightful views of the East River, the Sound, and a number of charming spots on Long Island can be obtained. The dwelling has been extended and altered to suit its present purpose, and is provided with all the comforts of a first-class residence. It is surrounded by shrubbery and gardens beautifully laid out, and supplied with all the accessories necessary for the old people's amusement outdoors. The Home at present accommodates over 70 aged men and women. They are all domiciled in airy, well-furnished rooms, and clothed better than many persons with thousands of dollars at their command. The daily bill of fare is excellent, and through the liberality of the generous patrons of the institution the inmates are supplied with everything they wish—nutritious wines, good nourishment, and abundant reading matter. A remarkable and praiseworthy feature in the management of the Home is the entire absence of anything which looks like the cold, conventional, charitable asylum. The place certainly looks and feels like a genuine home, and the old folks are perfect specimens of contentment and happiness. The success of the institution is undoubtedly due to the indefatigable labors of Mrs. P. J. Joachimsen, President, and the estimable ladies by whom she has been assisted. Five years ago, when Mrs. Joachimsen assumed the Presidency, the Home was $300 in debt; now the list of patrons numbers over 1,500, 10 per cent of the present beautiful Home—$3,600 per year—is paid two years in advance, and a balance of $2,300 remains in bank. The Home is supplied with a synagogue, which has been tastefully fitted up and supplied with the sacred rolls of the law, and all other necessaries, at the private expense of Mrs. Joachimsen.

The reception, which commenced yesterday at 11 A. M. and closed at 6 P. M., will be continued today and adjourn to Sunday next, on which day it will close. The visitors were received by Mrs. Joachimsen, aided by Mrs. S. Herman, Mrs. J. Schulla, Mrs. S. Weich, Mrs. S. Rother, Mrs. J. D. Jacobowsky, Mrs. Ignatz Stein, Mrs. M. Whitehead, and Mrs. Joseph Stiner, and Mr. Morris Goodhart did valuable service in showing the company through the Home, with the inmates of which it was very evident he was a great favorite. Among those who called were Lazarus Morgenthau, Joseph Stiner, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Lyons, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Einhorn, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Isaacs, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Jacobs, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Gotthell, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. A. Huetson, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. S. Adler, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. A. Rubin, Mrs. A. Lithauer, Hon. Joseph and Mrs. Koon, ex-Judge Joachimsen, Solomon Weil, Mrs. Dora Adler, Mr. and Mrs. B. Wyman, Mr. and Mrs. I. Rosenwald, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Loth, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Heller, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Frankenheimer, Mr. and Mrs. T. Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. A. Barnett, Mr. and Mrs. Max Herzog, Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Levy, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Littauer, Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Moses, Mr. and Mrs. H. V. Rothschild, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Stiner, Jun., Simon Bernheimer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Schlesinger, Mr. and Mrs. Josian Salomon, Mrs. M. Koppman, Mrs. Morris Goodhart, Mrs. H. Kochler, Mrs. J. Kerbs, Mrs. M. Marks, Mrs. H. Betman, Mrs. A. Schoole, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Walbch, Mrs. U. Herrman, Mrs. L. Steiel, Mrs. Sophia Brunner, Mrs. Marx Rothschild, Mrs. Klingenstein, Mrs. L. Levenburg, Mrs. E. J. King, Mrs. Lawrence Myers, Mrs. T. H. Keesing, Mrs. S. J. Helo, Mrs. A. Jakouy, Mrs. Bernhard Mayer, Mrs. Joseph Strouse, Mrs. Julius Hart, Mrs. S. Brusa, and a number of others. Several handsome presents and donations were received during the day, and a number of visitors testified their interest in the success of the institution by having their names recorded for contributions in "the Silver Book of Life." A pleasing incident of the day was the presentation to Mr. Isaac Sherman of a handsomely framed and engrossed set of resolutions, expressive of the thanks of the lady Directresses to that gentleman for his valuable services during the 25 critical years in the history of the Home, during which he had acted as Treasurer. The presentation address was effectively made by Mrs. President Joachimsen, and responded to in appropriate terms by the recipient. The ladies of the committee in attendance expect a large attendance to-day should the weather be favorable.

ATTEMPTED WIFE-MURDER.

Some time ago, Mrs. Agnes Nager, the proprietress of a lager-beer saloon at No. 19 Bleecker-street, separated from her husband, Albert Nagler, in consequence of a tendency on his part to treat her in a brutal manner. After his wife declined to live with him, Nagler, who had been entirely dependent on her for support, obtained a situation as bar-tender, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mrs. Nagler, frequently visited her saloon, from which he seldom departed without meeting her. For these assaults she almost invariably caused his arrest, but the fear of a brief term of imprisonment did not deter him from subjecting her to a periodical beating. Yesterday afternoon he entered the saloon with a more bloodthirsty purpose, for he immediately drew a large pocket knife and attacked the woman, stabbing her four times on the left arm. Several times he aimed deadly blows at her throat, which, fortunately for her, was protected by a thick woolen shawl. The fact that this garment was pierced by the knife in several places bears testimony to Nagler's murderous intentions. The screams of the woman attracted the attention of Officer Devine, of the Fifteenth Precinct, who captured Nagler as he was in the act of escaping from the saloon. The prisoner, who has been tending bar at No. 153 Bleecker-street, will be arraigned at the Washington Place Police Court this morning.

THE TOMB OF WASHINGTON.

The Managers of the "Mount Vernon Aid Society of New-York," in conjunction with the parent association, the "Ladies' Mount Vernon Association of the Union," desirous of rescuing the tomb of Washington from all appearance of neglect and decay, have resumed operations in this City, and are endeavoring to create an endowment fund. In order to facilitate this praiseworthy object they propose to give an amateur entertainment at the Academy of Music on April 10. The "Mistletoe Bough" is in preparation, and will be presented on that date mentioned. Boxes may be obtained from Mrs. Marshall O. Roberts, No. 107 Fifth-avenue, and tickets can be had from any of the managers, among whom may be mentioned Mrs. Howard Townsend, Albany, Vice Regent of New-York for the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association of the Union, Mrs. Chester A. Arthur, Mrs. C. Alphonso, Mrs. John Bigelow, Mrs. S. L. M. Barlow, Mrs. John R. Brady, Mrs. J. Alfred Davenport, Mrs. R. Ogden Doremus, Mrs. Joseph H. Drexel, Mrs. Charles A. Dana, Mrs. Dorman B. Eaton, Mrs. T. A. Emmet, Mrs. C. Godfrey Gunther, Mrs. James W. Gerard, Mrs. W. H. Hageman, Mrs. S. C. Hargrar, Mrs. John Taylor Johnston, Mrs. Gouverneur Morris, Jr., Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. Henry L. Nicholas, Mrs. Benjamin K. Phelps, Mrs. Paran Stevens, Mrs. Robert Sewell, and Mrs. Prof. Charlier.

THE TURNVEREIN EXHIBITION.

The annual athletic and musical entertainment of the New-York Turnverein was given last night in the large hall of their building in Fourth-street. A large number of ladies and gentlemen witnessed the performances, which were excellent throughout. The exhibition was opened with a calisthenic exercise by members from the different classes. This was followed by exercises on the parallel bars. The excellent manner in which all the gentlemen acquitted themselves in this performance was much applauded. A bout with broadsword between Messrs. J. Hornung and F. Schmidt, club swinging by Mr. J. Horn, and pyramids by all the members, closed the first series of the exercises. After an intermission of 10 minutes, the members showed their proficiency on the horizontal bar, and Prof. L. Friederick and Mr. F. Steinmetz gave an exhibition of sparring. Then followed another pyramidal display, and the exhibition was closed with vaulting with the horse and leaping. Choruses were sung during the evening by the members, and after the exercises were over the hall was cleared and dancing was begun and kept up until a late hour.

A BURGLAR SHOT.

Thomas McWilliams, the proprietor of a feed store at No. 83 Ninth-avenue, the second floor of which he occupies as a dwelling, was awakened at 2 o'clock yesterday morning by strange noises in the store. Hastily descending by a private stairway he was confronted by two young men, who had entered by forcing open the rear door. McWilliams called loudly for assistance, and was answered by Officers Purvis and Hadden, of the Sixteenth Precinct, who pursued the burglars as they endeavored to escape through the doorway by which they had gained access to the store. Officer Purvis fired his revolver at them, the bullet entering the right leg of one of the men. The two then surrendered, and were taken to the station, where the wounded man was registered as Thomas Clark, aged 21, of No. 236 West Thirty-fourth-street, and his companion as Joseph Smith, aged 18, of No. 232 West Twenty-eighth-street. Clark, after being attended by Police Surgeon Wade, was taken to Bellevue Hospital, and Smith was locked up. The Police ascertained yesterday that these young men also broke into the coal office of Thomas Stokes, No. 373 Tenth-avenue, during Saturday night. Smith was arraigned before Justice Otterbourg at the Washington-place Police Court yesterday, and was held for trial in default of $1,000 bail.

THE DEAD CUBAN GENERAL.

THE REMAINS OF MAJOR GEN. AGUILERA LYING IN STATE IN THE CITY HALL.

The remains of Major Gen. Francisco Vicente Aguilera were placed in a handsome silver-mounted casket on Saturday afternoon, and early yesterday morning were placed in the Governor's Room in the City Hall, which had been appropriately draped in mourning for the occasion. The Cuban and American flags were displayed at half-mast on the flagstaff on the cupola, with the State and Municipal flags on each side. The casket was placed on a small catafalque in the centre of the room, with the banner of the Society La Independencia de Cuba, of this City, at its head, and the flag of Cuba Libre tastefully draped about the lower extremity. This is the first Cuban flag ever made, and was carried by the Kentucky regiment in the expedition to Cuba, under the command of Col. O'Hara, at the time of the movement organized by Gen. Narciso Lopez. The flag displayed over the City Hall is that of the Cuban agency of this City, and was furnished for the occasion by Messrs. Aldama and Echeverria, foreign agents of the insurrectionary Government. Through an oval glass plate set in the lid of the casket the face and upper portion of the body of the deceased could be seen, and during the day a large number of Gen. Aguilera's personal friends, and many of the Cuban refugees residing in this City, filed through the room to look upon his features for the last time. A guard of honor consisting of Messrs. J. J. Govantes, J. M. Macias, J. A. Polo, Leandro Rodriguez, Francisco Valdes Mendoza, Serapio Aguilera, Nestor Ponce de Leon, Plutarco Gonzales, Cayetano Ribas, Domingo Ferrer, J. Lamadrid, Eusebio Perez, Ignacio Varona, Ramon Rosa, Eduardo Codina, Calisto Sanchez, Juan Billido de Luna, Juan Ferrer, Miguel Montejo, M. A. Aguilera, M. F. Martinez, Marcos Lopez, Antonio de Serra, Rafael Lanza, Hilario Cisneros, J. Mola, and G. Acosta, watched the remains through the day and night. This morning, at 9 o'clock, they will be removed to the Roman Catholic Church of St. Francis Xavier, Sixteenth-street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues, where the funeral ceremonies will be performed. The body will then be borne from the church to the Marble Cemetery, in Second-street, near First-avenue, on the shoulders of a deputation of colored Cubans, who requested to be allowed to perform this service as a manifestation of respect to the memory of one who was the first to liberate his slaves in the Island of Cuba. The Cuban Societies La Independencia de Cuba, La Fraternidad, La Estrella de Cuba, Laborantes, La Union, and Los Veinte y Cinco, will assemble at the City Hall, and march in procession to the church with the remains.

A VICTIM OF STARVATION.

THE DEAD BODY OF A WOMAN FOUND IN AN EAST SIDE TENEMENT—HER HUSBAND IN A BEASTLY STATE OF INTOXICATION—FIVE LITTLE CHILDREN LEFT HOMELESS AND MOTHERLESS.

As Officer Lestman, of the Eighteenth Precinct, was patrolling his post on First-avenue on Saturday evening he saw Martin McCormick throw a stone through the plate-glass window of Boylan's liquor store, on First-avenue near Twenty-fourth street. He arrested him, and found that he was just commencing to experience the horrors of an attack of the delirium tremens. While conveying him to the station-house in East Twenty-second-street a little girl, aged 13 years, the daughter of the prisoner, ran up to the officer and begged him not to let her father come back, saying that he had been drunk for many days, and was crazy from liquor, and now that her mother was lying dead at the house it was not right to have him in the house. The officer accompanied the girl to the house, where, lying on the bare floor, he found the dead body of the poor mother and wife, while around her, convulsively sobbing, stood five little children, the oldest of whom was the girl before alluded to. The brutal father gazed down upon the dead face of his wife without any apparent emotion. He was too drunk to realize what had occurred. The little girl then informed the officer, and her story was corroborated by the neighbors, that her mother had died on Thursday night, or more probably some time during Friday morning, and that no arrangements had been made to bury her. The officer then went to the station-house and reported the case, and the keeper of the Morgue was notified to remove the body for burial. The family was in an extremely destitute condition, and the probability is that Mrs. McCormick's death was caused by want of food. The husband was arraigned yesterday before Justice Smith, in the Fifty-seventh-street Police Court, and was sent to prison for 10 days.

A CHILD RESCUED FROM A BRUTAL MASTER.

As Mr. E. Fellows Jenkins, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, was passing up Broadway at 11 o'clock on Saturday night, he observed an organ-grinder, named Louis Pejano, roughly shaking a little girl whom he claimed was his daughter Mary. The little girl had been collecting pennies all day, and having become exhausted had fallen asleep. Mr. Jenkins recognized the fellow as a man who had been arrested at his instance during last October. At that time it was learned that Pejano had no family in this country. Mr. Jenkins followed the man for awhile and finally arrested him. The prisoner was arraigned before Justice Otterbourg, at the Washington-place Police Court, yesterday morning, where he was held for trial in default of $300 bail. Little Mary was returned to the custody of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The poor girl said she was 13 years old, but her hard life had so stinted her growth as to give her the appearance of being considerably younger.

SPARRING AND FENCING EXHIBITION.

The annual athletic entertainment given by Col. Monstery took place on Saturday night at the School of Arms, No. 619 Sixth-avenue. The entertainment was opened with a sparring exhibition by one Col. Monstery's pupils and a friend, in which some straight and hard hitting was displayed. An assault with foils followed between Prof. Deturck, of Wood's Museum, and Capt. Nicholas, of Paris, in which the honors were equally divided. A boxing match between G. McCarthy and an amateur resulted in an easy victory for the former. Then came a small-sword assault between Prof. Friederich, of the New-York Turnverein, and Col. Monastery, which was the feature of the evening. Col. Monstery's little sons, Otto and Comanio, aged 8 and 9 years respectively, then had a set-to with gloves, and their straight hitting and plucky rallies excited much applause. A bout with gloves between Prof. William Miller and Prof. Friederich, and a sabre contest between Col. Monstery and Prof. Friederich closed the entertainment.

THE TOMBS POLICE COURT ON SUNDAY.

Justice Duffy presided at the Tombs Police Court yesterday. Forty prisoners were arraigned on various complaints, principally for being drunk and disorderly. Patrick Devine, of No. 144 Mulberry-street, while going to his home Saturday evening was violently assaulted by Patrick Tighe, who was held to answer in $300 bail. James L. Cleary, residing at No. 36 Mott-street, was arraigned on a charge of attempting to shoot with a pistol Denis McBride, who resides at No. 37 Oak-street. Detective Carr, of the Fourth Precinct, arrested the prisoner. He was remanded for trial to the Court of General Sessions, and held in $1,000 bail. Oscar Seibert entered the residence of Hannah Berks, at No. 17 Rector-street, and violently assaulted her by striking her with his clenched fist in the face. He was held to answer in $600 bail. Patrick McCullen was held to answer for having assaulted Matthew Brady, whose face was swollen and disfigured from the effects of the beating he had received.

A DOG THIEF ARRESTED.

On Friday last the little daughter of Mr. Thomas Durant was walking in Madison-square, leading a skye terrier by a chain. Two men, watching their opportunity, snatched up the poodle and ran away with it. Mr. Durant inserted an advertisement in the morning papers, on Saturday, offering a reward of $50 for the restoration of the dog. On Saturday evening Officer Schmidburger arrested William Edwards in Seventh-avenue, while the latter was carrying a skye terrier in his arms which resembled in description the one lost by Mr. Durant. Edwards was taken to the Twenty-ninth Precinct Station-house, Mr. Durant was sent for, and there was a mutual recognition between dog and master. The prisoner was arraigned at the Washington Place Police Court yesterday, but as Mr. Durant was prevented from attending, the prisoner was remanded to the station-house until this morning.

A DEFAULTER HELD FOR TRIAL.

Charles Anderson, who was arrested by Detectives Dunn and Von Gerichten on board the steamer Hudson, on Saturday, upon a charge made by the Superintendent of Police of Chicago, that the accused had embezzled the sum of $600 from a firm by whom he was employed as a book-keeper, was arraigned before Justice Otterbourg, at the Washington-place Police Court, yesterday, but as the officer bearing a requisition from the Governor of Illinois had not arrived, the prisoner was remanded to the Central Office. The culprit was discovered to be in New-York through a person in Chicago with whom he corresponded, and who received a letter from the prison with the address No. 127 Charlton-street.

A fire was discovered shortly after 12 o'clock in Cohen's rooms, but it was extinguished after damaging the place to the extent of $50. It was insured for $500, and there are grounds for the supposition that Cohen started the fire for the purpose of obtaining that amount.

Mr. John W. Kelsey, a brother of Miss Lizzie Kelsey, the actress, who was robbed of her wardrobe a few days ago, appeared in the Washington-place Police Court yesterday, and preferred a charge against George, alias Jacky, Mellon, who keeps a "dive" at No. 9 First-street, of complicity in the robbery. Some of the clothing belonging to Miss Kelsey was found in McCloud's place. The prisoner was allowed to go on parole until next Wednesday.

John Pentland, whose gambling house, No. 856 Broadway, was raided on Saturday evening, was arraigned before Justice Otterbourg, at the Washington-place Police Court, and held to bail in the sum of $1,000, upon the affidavit of Officer Duffy, of the Fifteenth Precinct, that the prisoner kept a gambling house on the premises. The officer testified that he did not "see any playing going on." A full "lay out" of implements used in the game called "faro" was produced in court.

The schooner recently reported as having been forced ashore at Mattituck proved to be the Cygnus, of Machias, Me., for New-York, with a cargo of lath in the hold and a deck-load of spruce lumber consigned to Simpson & Clapp. She went on at high water, bilged, and filled. THE PRESIDENTIAL COUNT.

FILIBUSTERING DELAYS CHECKED.

PENNSYLVANIA AND RHODE ISLAND COUNTED FOR HAYES AND WHEELER—TEMPESTUOUS SCENES IN THE HOUSE—HEWITT'S SECOND ATTACK ON HOAR AND DISASTROUS REPULSE—SOUTH CAROLINA REACHED—THE PAPERS SENT BEFORE THE ELECTORAL TRIBUNAL.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—At 10 o'clock this morning the House was called to order, the floor being thronged with lobbyists and others, but very few members were in their seats. The galleries were again crowded to overflowing, and many ladies were standing in the halls and passage-ways unable to obtain seats. Immediately upon the call for order Mr. Burchard took the floor to offer a resolution on the Pennsylvania case. He was interrupted by Hiester Clymer, one of the most persistent filibusters, who stated that there was obviously no quorum present, and moved a call of the House. This gave rise to a rambling and unimportant discussion, which consumed considerable valuable time. Then Clymer's motion was carried and the roll was called. Mr. Frost moved to dispense with further proceedings under the call, whereupon the obstructionists, undaunted by their former defeats, took the floor in the persons of Messrs. O'Brien and Watling, and demanded a division on the question. They were again defeated by the overwhelming majority of 151 to 21, and then the business of the day was allowed to proceed. The first move made by the Republicans was not a wise one, and during the day they made a number of blunders which placed them for the time completely in the control of those who desired to delay the counting of the vote. It was clearly the policy of those who desired the canvass to go on to refrain from debate and let the revolutionists exhaust themselves, which they would soon have done if let alone. Instead of doing this, however, the Republicans were quite as talkative as were the rebellious Democrats, and occupied at least half the time which was wasted in useless debate. Within the past week they have thrown away at least 24 hours in this way, and if the count should by any chance fail for the want of one more day of time, they will be largely to blame. Mr. Kelley was the first on his feet after the division. He offered a resolution to the effect that the vote of the Pennsylvania Elector, Boggs, be counted, despite the objection which was made on Saturday. Of course this was at once followed by a resolution from the Democratic side which provided that Boggs' vote be not counted. Upon this, Mr. Stenger, representing the most violent filibustering element, caused considerable delay by demanding that the objection be read. Mr. Kelley opposed this on the ground that only two hours were allowed for debate, and that the reading would consume a large part of this time. The Speaker overruled this objection, and stated that the time consumed in the reading would not come out of the two hours allowed for debate. The objection was then read, and at its conclusion, Walling, another violent revolutionist, jumped to his feet and demanded the reading of the testimony. Mr. Wilson objected, but the Speaker decided against them by declaring that the House could determine whether or not it would hear the testimony. A vote by yeas and nays was taken after a long wrangle, and the filibusters won by a vote of 133 to 116. Among those voting in the negative were the following 13 Democrats: Messrs. Goodin, Hancock, Haymond, Morgan, Phelps, Reagan, Stevenson, Tarbox, Throckmorton, Ward, Whitehouse, Williams, of Delaware, and Wilshire.

The reading of the testimony consumed the time until 12:10, and then the regular two hours debate commenced. It was conducted for the most part by a number of obscure gentlemen, who have written or have had written for them long and dreary speeches which they read in 10-minute installments, whenever an opportunity offers. The only interesting part of the discussion was the second violent attack which poor Mr. Hewitt thought proper to make upon Mr. Commissioner Hoar in particular, and the Electoral tribunal generally. The speech, which had evidently been carefully prepared, was a truly remarkable effort, and gave additional force to Mr. Hoar's opinion that its author is not quite in his right mind. During its delivery Mr. Hoar was not in the chamber, being in consultation with the other members of the Commission. He returned soon afterward, however, and obtained the floor. Then, in a few well-chosen words, he completely demolished the charge of his adversary, and concluded by holding him up to the ridicule of the House in a way which will long be remembered in Washington. During this part of the debate Senator Blaine was an interested spectator. In closing his speech, Mr. Hewitt made a very sensible appeal to his fellow-Democrats to abide by the decision of the Commission, and then spoiled the good effect of the advice by talking about the great fight they should make for their liberty four years hence, and saying he was ready to lead or to follow, when the time came. After a number of declamatory efforts, by Mr. Beebe, of New-York, and others, the two hours' debate was ended. A resolution was passed by a party vote to sustain the objection to the Pennsylvania Elector, and, on motion of Mr. Kelley, the Senate was notified that the House was ready to receive it.

After a delay of several minutes, caused by getting the Senators together, the upper house appeared, and the joint session commenced. After counting the vote of Pennsylvana for Hayes, Rhode Island was called, and after the certificates had been read objection was made to counting the vote of one of the Electors chosen to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of Mr. Corliss a Centenial Commissioner. This objection required the two houses to again separate. As soon as the Senate had withdrawn, Mr. Poppleton, of Ohio, moved to take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, and on this the yeas and nays were ordered. The roll call was watched with great interest upon both sides, as a report had been circulated during the morning that the obstructionists who had labored very industriously, yesterday, to obtain recruits, had succeeded in inducing a considerable number to join them. The votes earlier in the day, on permitting the reading of testimony, contributed to make the opponents of delay feel somewhat unbasy. As the roll call progressed, however, it was apparent from the number deserting the obstructionists that they would be defeated by a more decided vote than on Saturday. The result of the roll call was 83 for a recess and 178 against it. In order to clinch the vote, Fernando Wood moved to reconsider the vote, and moved to lay that motion upon the table. The obstructionists took advantage of this to waste another half hour in calling the roll on Wood's motion, which having been done, their power to delay the two hours' discussion on the Rhode Island objections was exhausted.

The debate was opened by Mr. Jenks, of Pennsylvania, who argued in support of the objections for a few minutes, and then launched into the questions involved in the Louisiana controversy. Mr. Ballou, of Rhode Island, argued against the objections, showing that special pains had been taken by the Legislature of Rhode Island to have the Electoral vote of the State free from any irregularity whatever. It was apparent that there was no disposition to discuss the objections, and when Mr. O'Brien, of Maryland, arose he was met with cries of "vote" from both sides of the house. O'Brien, however, who is one of the most determined of the filibusters, persisted in occupying his 10 minutes, and was followed by Mr. Burchard, of Illinois, who could not be induced by his Republican associates to forego speaking. Mr. Carr, of Indiana, who opposed the passage of the Electoral bill, but who has regularly voted against all dilatory motions, made some good points on the Democrats by quoting from the speeches made by some of them in urging the passage of the Electoral bill, and then quoting, by way of contrast, from the speeches of the same Democratic orators in denouncing the findings of the Commission. Carr's speech irritated his Democratic colleagues in proportion as it amused the Republicans, and when his 10 minutes had expired the Democrats objected to allowing him the few additional minutes necessary to finish his speech.

The vote was then taken, and the resolution declaring that the Electoral vote objected to should be counted, notwithstanding the objections, was passed without a division. Mr. McCrary, of Iowa, then offered a resolution notifying the Senate of the action of the House in the Rhode Island case, and inviting that body to again meet the House in Joint Convention. Proctor Knott offered a substitute for this inviting the Senate to meet the House at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Mr. McCrary called the attention of the Speaker to the Electoral act, which provides that when the two houses shall have disposed of an objection raised to counting a vote, they shall immediately reassemble in joint convention and resume counting the Electoral vote. This point was sustained by the Speaker, and the Senate was then given notice of the action of the House. When the two houses separated on the Rhode Island case, and the Senate returned to its own chamber, a resolution was offered to the effect that the entire vote of the State be counted for the Republican candidates, notwithstanding the objection. To this Mr. Burnside made a short speech, as did also Mr. Bayard, and then without further debate a vote was taken. The first Democratic Senator called was Mr. Bailey, of Tennessee, a new member, who is not yet quite up to the duties of his position. He voted "No" on the resolution, and seemed to be very much surprised to find that every one of his Democratic associates voted with the Republicans against him. Just as the roll-call was being completed he changed his vote to the affirmative, and the resolution was adopted unanimously. It was noticeable that Senator Gordon, who signed the Rhode Island objection, stultified himself by voting for the resolution. Mr. Kelly, the only other Senator who put his name to the objection, dodged the vote by going into one of the cloak-rooms soon after the call commenced.

At 6 o'clock the Senate re-appeared in the hall of the House, and the business of the Joint Convention was resumed. South Carolina was the next State called. When the Hayes certificate had been read the Presiding Officer asked for objections, forgetting that duplicate certificates had been received. The second certificate was read, and the usual objections were presented. All the papers were then referred to the Commission, and, after separating, both houses took a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Under the Electoral bill it is impossible for either house to transact any business not connected with the count, while the vote of any State is being considered. Because of this law, the Senate was obliged to-day to remain idle for nearly five hours, the only business transacted being the election of Senator Kernan to fill the place on the Commission made vacant by the sickness of Senator Thurman. The vote was unanimous. The scene in the Senate Chamber during this session of forced idleness was a remarkable one. The galleries were crowded to excess by persons who were unable to get into the House, and were glad to find a seat anywhere. On the floor, many of the Senators consulted in groups, while others read newspapers, wrote letters, or quietly smoked in the cloak-rooms. President Ferry occupied his chair as usual. The pages were all in their places, and the clerks at their desks, but none of them moved or spoke, and at times it could easily be imagined that the whole Senate had suddely been petrified.

MEETING OF THE COMMISSION.

PREPARING FOR THE SOUTH CAROLINA CASE—THE NAMES OF DEMOCRATIC COUNSEL NOT YET KNOWN—MESSRS. SHELLABARGER AND MATHEWS TO APPEAR FOR THE REPUBLICANS—A CONTINUOUS SITTING LIKELY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—The Electoral Commission assembled immediately after receiving the papers in the case of South Carolina. Messrs. Hurd, of Ohio, and Cochrane, of Pennsylvania, appeared on the part of the Democratic objectors. They stated that they would announce to-morrow the names of counsel who will appear for their side. Senator Christiancy, on the part of the Republican objectors, announced that Messrs. Shellabarger and Mathews will appear as counsel for the Republicans. Argument will commence at 10 o'clock to-morrow. On the Republican side no more time than is absolutely necessary will be occupied in argument, and there is a proposition, which is likely to be acted upon, that the Republican objectors shall waive argument, and permit counsel to go on with whatever argument may be necessary. The rules of the Commission, as originally adopted, permit eight hours of argument on the South Carolina case. It will be impossible, if the whole of this time is consumed, to bring the report back to the House before Wednesday afternoon, if indeed before Thursday. In the South Carolina case there is nothing at all which requires argument, and it is suggested that the Commission may change its rules and limit the speeches to one hour or two hours on each side. Republican counsel will not care to make any arguments further than is necessary to meet the points that may be advanced on the Democratic side, and as there is no desire on the part of the Democrats to argue the case at all before the Commission, except to secure as much delay as possible, there seems to be no reason why the objections should not be speedily disposed of. It is, however, possible that a majority of the Commission may be unwilling to shorten the time heretofore intended for argument in these cases, and if so, the South Carolina case can only be hastened by a continuous sitting. The hope is generally entertained that the case may be decided and the report made to the two houses to-morrow.

WILL THE COUNT BE COMPLETED?

INDICATIONS FROM YESTERDAY'S WORK—WHAT REMAINS TO BE DONE—A DEEP SCHEME STILL FEARED—AN ATTEMPT TO ABSORB THE WHOLE TIME LEFT IN READING COMMITTEE TESTIMONY—WILL IT SUCCEED?

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—All the progress was made with the Electoral count to-day that was expected, South Carolina being sent to the Commission, which will meet to-morrow morning to consider the returns. And yet there are many Republicans who are hopeless of an election being declared this week. Politicians, like stock gamblers, are divided into two classes—the "bulls" and the "bears." These are found on every hand—the hopeful and the hopeless. On the Republican side the despondent element is considerably reduced, and the reduction has made it somewhat more conspicuous. There are several Republican members of Congress who express the opinion that the count will certainly be defeated, but the class of hopeful ones is considerably increased by the developments of to-day. There really seems to be no room to doubt that the count will be finished and the result declared not later than Thursday or Friday. The action of the Commission to-morrow with respect to the proposition to shorten the argument on the South Carolina case will determine whether one day more or less will be occupied in the business. There now remain to be formally counted the votes of South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. Of these States three give their votes to Mr. Hayes. To votes in those three States alone will objections be made. Unless the vote of to-day on the motion for a recess pending the discussion of the Rhode Island case should be reversed in the most remarkable manner, no recesses will be taken after the report is made on South Carolina until the vote of Wisconsin is counted, unless the houses should become wearied late at night and take a recess, when it is evident there will still be plenty of time to conclude all the business of the joint meeting. The filibusters would evidently fight every inch of the way, even if they were reduced to half their present number, and they will take up all the time possible in objections to South Carolina, Vermont, and Wisconsin.

It has been rumored for two or three days that when the decision of the Commission in the case of South Carolina is read in the two houses, the objections which will be presented will contain in the body of them the report and the testimony taken by the House committee in South Carolina. The entire manuscript, covering 15,000 pages, has been withdrawn from the public printing office, and there is no doubt that the attempt will be made to force its reading as a part of the objections, or by a vote of the House, when the objections come to be considered, as was done in the case of Pennsylvania to-day. The time required to read this mass of testimony, if relays of clerks were kept at it night and day, is variously estimated at from two days to two weeks. Nobody can tell exactly how long it would take, but it is clear that a vote in favor of reading it would be a vote to defeat the announcement of the election. If it is presented as a part of the objections to the Commission's decision, it will doubtless be ruled out of order by Mr. Ferry, the Presiding Officer, for the law requires the objections to be concisely stated, without argument. Speaker Randall would submit the question of reading it to the House, if offered as the Pennsylvania testimony was offered to-day, and no one who believes the 70 Democrats voting with the Republicans to-day really intend to have the count concluded, can imagine that the motion to read will be carried. The great probability is that such an outrageous proposition would cause a further desertion from the faction of Field and Clymer.

The Vermont and Wisconsin objections will be disposed of in the same manner as the two objections to-day, and the count of all the remaining Democratic States will not require a half hour. The filibusters are fortifying themselves by the letters and dispatches they receive from outraged constituents, who have reported to the average number of perhaps half a dozen to each of the obstructors. Those who do not feel outraged are not active in sending dispatches, though numerous admonitions of popular indignation with the attempt to force the country into chaotic confusion, are beginning to come to hand. Among the outraged persons is the notorious Tildenite John Bigelow, of New-York, from whom it is asserted three or four letters have come to Washington, beseeching Democrats to save the country, by preventing it from having any President.

PLACING THEMSELVES ON RECORD.

THE YEAS AND NAYS ON A MOTION TO TAKE A RECESS—A DIRECT LOSS TO THE FILIBUSTERS—AN ANALYSIS OF THE VOTE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—The report of last night that the filibusters would lose 20 votes on the next direct attempt at intentional delay of the count was verified by the roll call to-day, on Poppleton's motion for a recess until to-morrow, made when the two houses were separated on the objections to the vote of Rhode Island. On Saturday the vote for a recess was 112; to-day it was 83. The difference between the votes is 29. Of the 112 ayes on Saturday 22 voted no to-day, 9 were absent or dodged, and there were 2 recruits from those who did not vote on Saturday. On that day 49 Democrats voted against a recess, and to-day the number was increased to about 70. Among those who voted for a recess on Saturday and changed to the other side to-day were Blount, of Georgia; Buckner, of Missouri; Gause, of Arkansas; Gunter, of Arkansas; Hunton, of Virginia; Lamar, of Mississippi; Landers, of Connecticut; Rea, of Missouri; Singleton, of Mississippi; Tucker, of Virginia; Wilson, of West Virginia, and Yeates, of North Carolina—all of whom, being more than half the revolutionary loss, are re-elected members of the next Congress, and have something to lose by pursuing a course which nine-tenths of their constituents would disapprove. All but one of them—Landers, of Connecticut—are from the South. Of the nine who voted for a recess Saturday but did not vote on either side to-day, six are re-elect members. Those who are not re-elected, but changed from voting aye to voting no since Saturday, are Burchard, of Wisconsin; Chapin, of Massachusetts; Faulkner, of West Virginia; Hamilton, of New-Jersey; Holman, of Indiana; Landers, of Indiana; Odell, of New-York; John Reilly, of Pennsylvania, and Warren, of Massachusetts. Inquiry would probably show that all of these men have either some hope of future political preferment, or have reputations of being honorable men which it is worth while for them to continue to maintain at home. Of the 83 who insisted on delay, about one-third are of the class that stole into Congress in Republican districts from the Northern States two years ago, and having been defeated for re-election, they fade from public sight forever unless a Democratic administration should get into power and give them office by appointment which they cannot get by election. These are, for the most part, the men who are leading the forelorn hope of the ousted bummers and the crazy, rickety-minded Bourbons. The two recruits to the filibustering vote to-day were Douglas, of Virginia, and Meade, of New-York.

THE PRESIDENCY OF THE SENATE.

A RESOLUTION TO PROCEED TO ELECT A PRESIDENT "PRO TEMPORE" OFFERED BY MR. SARGENT—NO CAUCUS YET HELD BY THE REPUBLICAN SENATORS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—Just at the close of to-day's session of the Senate, Mr. Sargent offered a resolution that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore. This resolution was entirely unexpected, and was laid upon the table, from which it can be called up at any time by a majority of the Senate. It is not understood that any immediate action is contemplated, but the resolution is precautionary, and made with reference to the possibility of the defeat of the Electoral count. There has been no caucus of Republican Senators to consider the election of a successor to Mr. Ferry, and in case the election of Mr. Hayes should be announced on Thursday very probably no action will be taken on the resolution.

A SUGGESTION.

PROPOSITION THAT THE STATE LEGISLATURE CHOOSE ELECTORS TO ACT IN NOVEMBER.

HARTFORD, Feb. 26.—The Evening Post of to-day makes the following suggestion: "A failure to declare the result of the Presidential election will be at the risk of serious disaster to the business interests of the country. Fortunately there is a way by which the annoyance of such a prolongation of the controversy may be in great part averted, at least in New-England and New-York. Most of the Legislatures of these seven States are now in session, and looking to the interests of this section they should at once proceed to choose Electors to act in November. In this way this entire section will be withdrawn from the excitement of a new campaign, and the result of the new election would be so nearly settled in advance that the affair need not occupy much of the time or the thoughts of the rest of the country.

THE POSTMASTERSHIP OF CHICAGO.

GEN. M'ARTHUR'S LIABILITIES AND ASSETS—THE AMOUNT OF HIS INDEBTEDNESS TO THE GOVERNMENT—HON. FRANK W. PALMER APPOINTED TO THE OFFICE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CHICAGO, Feb. 26.—Further investigation of the affairs of Postmaster McArthur show him to be indebted to the Government in a larger sum than was at first reported. In addition to the $38,000 which he admits having borrowed, to use his own term, from the Post Office fund here, it appears that there were former complications which had not been settled up. At the time of the failure of the Cook County National Bank, in 1875, Gen. McArthur had on deposit there $40,000. The Treasury Department retained from the margin of the bonds deposited to secure the bank's circulation enough to reduce the amount to $20,000, which amount still stands against him. He was informed but a short time ago that he would be deemed a defaulter to this amount after March 4 were it not settled up before that time. The schedule in bankruptcy filed Saturday foots up $56,272 due the Government as preferred creditor. The secured claims embrace a long list of notes due banks and business men of this city and elsewhere. Among them are claims of Theodore Clement, Boston, for $21,800, and of the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad Company for $2,467. The unsecured claims are those of Himrod Furnace Company, Youngstown, Ohio, $1,985; Rend & Co., $660; Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad, $2,300; Union Iron Company, $600; Hardy & Bailes, $175; Matthew Addy & Co., $2,700; Rhodes & Bradley, $5,000; Norton Iron Works, $5,000; Charleston Furnace, $3,000; Tierney Iron Works, $3,800. McArthur's total liabilities are $125,000, with about $80,000 assets.

Hon. Frank W. Palmer, to-day appointed to the Postmastership, was for some time editor of the Inter-Ocean. He was formerly a member of Congress from Iowa.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

Gen. McArthur had a high business and social standing in the community, and has hitherto been considered one of the stanchest and most reliable of Chicago's citizens. He became involved in the unsuccessful operations of his large iron foundry on the north side, and took money from the General Post Office Department to tide matters over until a loan could be negotiated from Scotch capitalists. He expected also to be enabled to dispose favorably of some portion of his foundry; but in all his schemes for replacing the money he was unsuccessful, and consequently filed his petition in bankruptcy late Saturday afternoon. Of the debts, $56,000 are to the United States Government, and $2,500 to the Illinois Soldiers' Home, of which he is Treasurer. The secured debts are $43,000. The assets consist chiefly of the iron foundry property. It is believed that the Government will lose nothing, being amply secured by the bond.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

HAVANA, Feb. 26.—News from the City of Mexico under date of Feb. 18, says: Gen. Diaz has been elected President, and Ignacio Vallarte, Chief Justice. The trip of Gen. Diaz to the Northern States has been deferred, his presence being necessary at the capital. He intends issuing a manifesto calling on Liberals of all shades to support him. A man who requested an interview with the Archbishop of the City of Mexico, while conversing with him, drew a dagger and attempted to assassinate him. The Archbishop defended himself, and escaped unhurt. The servants arrested and handed the criminal over to the police. The Minister of the Treasury has established a school in his office for the purpose of teaching the employes book-keeping. Acting President Mendes will probably receive the appointment of Governor of Puebla.

THE LONDONDERRY MINING TROUBLES.

HALIFAX, Feb. 26.—All is quiet at the Londonderry mines. Troops arrived there at 12 o'clock last night. An inquest is being held on the body of McDougall.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

ACTION IN THE BRITISH HOUSE OF LORDS—AN ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN MOVED AND REJECTED—CONFERENCE WITH SAFVET PASHA BY THE SERVIAN DELEGATES—RUSSIA'S PEACE DECLARATIONS.

LONDON, Feb. 26.—In the House of Lords to-night Lord Stratheden moved an address to the Queen, praying that her Majesty would adopt measures to prevent hostilities in the East, secure adherence to the treaties of 1856, and promote the welfare of races subject to Turkey. Lord Stratheden urged that the Government should, by the acceptance of his motion, declare they would adhere to the treaties so far as Parliament would permit them. By their thus taking up a more decided attitude than hitherto, little doubt would remain that the peace of Europe and Asia would be secured.

Earl Grey made a strong anti-Russian speech. He deprecated interference between the Turks and their subjects.

The Earl of Derby then spoke. His main point was in refutation of Lord Stratheden's argument that England's treaty obligations were unchanged whatever might be the result of the conference. He said this argument, carried to its logical conclusion, involved the consequence that if the powers once bound themselves by treaty to protect a State they must still continue bound even if the State wilfully acted against their advice. Lord Stratheden's motion was rejected without a division.

A dispatch from Constantinople says the Servian delegates had a conference with Safvet Pasha to-day on certain details which are not yet settled. They will have another conference to-morrow. The protocol for the conclusion of peace on the basis of the status quo ante bellum will probably be signed then or on Wednesday, and Prince Milan will telegraph his agreement thereto.

A special dispatch from the same city states that the Military Police force which Col. Valentine Baker has been authorized to organize, will number 60,000, and foreign officers will be employed.

LONDON, Feb. 27.—The Berlin correspondent of a morning paper says: "The Russian Government is giving most pacific assurances which it would appear are credited everywhere except in Vienna, Russia frankly intimates that she has no wish to make war, and would be happy to desist from hostilities were some regard paid to her feelings and to the position in which she is placed. There is at this moment every chance of avoiding a conflict if Turkey can be induced to appoint some Christian Governors and make a bona fide attempt at administrative reform. As each power wishes to be the last to answer the Russian circular no writing answers will probably be given for some time. This universal silence, and the Emperors' speech at the opening of the Reichstag seem to have produced a sobering effect at St. Petersburg.

Advices received in Berlin yesterday evening from Vienna say, according to Vienna semi-official and independent organs, peace negotiations in Constantinople have been suspended and the Russians are preparing to cross the Pruth. The first assertion is wholly unfounded and the second is at variance with all Russia's recent assurances.

THE FENIAN LEADER'S FUNERAL.

ARRIVAL OF THE REMAINS OF JOHN O'MAHONEY AT DUBLIN—THE TRANSFER FROM CORK—GREAT CROWDS AWAITING THE FUNERAL CORTEGE.

DUBLIN, Feb. 26.—The remains of John O'Mahoney arrived here this evening. The Funeral Committee received the corpse at the railway terminus. The coffin was placed on a hearse, and escorted through the principal streets by a torch-light procession, in which 8,000 persons took part.

On the railway between Cork and Dublin people flocked to the stations to witness the passage of the train bearing the remains, and there were large assemblages at Charleville and Limerick Junction. About 500 persons awaited the arrival of the train at Kings-bridge. The procession, however, was deferred until dark. An immense and disorderly crowd blocked the road to the terminus. The procession, with several bands of music playing dirges, began to move about 8 o'clock, and marched along the quays. One account says there were 200,000 spectators. The remains were taken to the Mechanics' Institute, in the theatre of which they will lie in state until Sunday. The mob tried to force their way into the theatre with the corpse. They were so disorderly that half an hour was occupied in conveying the coffin a few yards from the hearse to the entrance, and those who bore it in were obliged to lift it over the heads of the people. In spite of the efforts of the committee, thousands forced their way into the building after the remains had been deposited in the theatre. Shortly after 9 o'clock the crowd began to disperse, but the desire to enter the building was such that it was not judged safe to open the doors to permit those inside inside to go home until 11 P. M.

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

THE OLD BAILEY IN DANGER—RESULT OF THE ELECTION AT AVIGNON, FRANCE—THE PAPACY.

LONDON, Feb. 26.—The roof of the old Bailey Sessions House was burned to-day. The damage was slight. A report that the Old Bailey was afire created considerable excitement in the city.

PARIS, Feb. 26.—A second ballot took place at Avignon yesterday to fill the vacancy in the Chamber of Deputies caused by the unseating of Comte du Demaine, (Monarchist,) Mayor of Avigno, on the ground of official coercion. Yesterday's ballot resulted in the election of M. St. Martin, (Radical,) who received 9,701 votes against 9,099 for Comte Du Demaine.

LONDON, Feb. 27.—A special dispatch from Rome says it is stated that the Cardinals submitted to the Pope on Friday favorable replies to some questions which he proposed to them with the object of giving the ecclesiastical policy of the Holy See a more efficacious and energetic direction toward a natural solution of the various questions of the day. The exact nature of the new policy will be proclaimed on the occasion of the Pope's Episcopal Jubilee. Some German Bishops recently asked whether they were at liberty to perform acts in execution of laws other than those against the Church if invited to do so by the civil authorities. The reply from the Vatican was that they might as subjects of the Emperor do so in all matters not contrary to religion and the rights of the Church.

THE BRITISH CORN TRADE.

LONDON, Feb. 26.—The Mark Lane Express, in its weekly review of the British corn trade, says: "The weather has been stormy and unsettled, with only a slightly diminished rain-fall. Field work, therefore, has progressed slowly on the heavy lands. Farming operations on the light lands, however, have been fairly rapid. Autumn-sown crops continue sufficiently healthy, but their future prosperity depends upon whether Winter has spent itself. Should the March weather be frosty the consequences may be disastrous. Farmers continue to thresh wheat slowly, there having been little incentive, as the damp weather has affected the condition of the bulk of the offerings, and the advance of 1 shilling per quarter, which has taken place, has applied only to dry samples. Despite the somewhat increased imports of foreign wheat, the firmness has continued, and the reaction was very marked last Monday, when a healthy and fairly brisk demand began for all varieties, at an advance of 1 shilling per quarter. The improvement is not due to politics, the weather, or the Continental demand, but is the legitimate effect of small imports, the diminution of stocks, and the prospective shortness of supplies from all sources except California. Some earlier shipments from San Francisco and Oregon have made their appearance in London, and freely found buyers at about 53 shillings to 55 shillings per quarter ex ships, and although we are likely to become receivers of a large quantity of this class of wheat as the season advances, it is probable that the shortness of stocks and the deficient harvests of 1876 in most parts of the world will bring continental buyers, and by diverting a considerable portion of the quantity afloat to other destinations, prevent our market being glutted with this useful variety of wheat. Our trade seems to be based on sound foundations, and the present moderate level of values appears likely to continue, being neither unduly depressed by the prospect of increased supplies from California nor temporarily enhanced by political anxiety. There has been a slight improvement in feeding corn. The firmness of holders has caused an advance of 6d. per quarter on oats, while maize, especially old corn, is higher. Barley remains without quotable alteration, but trade is rather better. Malting and grinding qualities have maintained previous prices. Business in floating cargoes has ruled firm, with slight enhancement of values.

EXCITEMENT IN NOVA SCOTIA.

THE GREAT SEAL OF STATE—ILLEGAL USE OF AN OLD SEAL—ALL MARRIAGES SINCE 1869 DECLARED VOID.

TORONTO, Feb. 26.—A special dispatch from Halifax says the question of precedence having arisen between certain Queen's counsel, an affidavit was read in the Supreme Court Saturday, setting forth that the seal attached to the Commission of Queen's counsel appointed by the local Government was not the great seal of the province, but the old seal which had been ordered to be returned by the Imperial Government in 1869. The Premier of the local Government admitted the Government had been using the old seal. The court expressed astonishment at such contempt for her Majesty's authorized and expressed opinion, and said that all acts requiring the great seal done since 1869 were totally void. This state of affairs leaves Nova Scotia to-day without a Parliament and without a Government, with all grants of marriage licenses, and consequently marriages, and all commissions since 1869, totally void. The greatest excitement prevails in consequence. The Chief Justice, after intimating that it would require Imperial legislation to rectify the matter, adjourned the court for 10 days for a full inquiry.

ROBBERY IN BOSTON.

A BOX CONTAINING $40,000 IN SECURITIES STOLEN BY ONE THIEF WHILE ANOTHER ENGAGED THE ATTENTION OF THE VICTIM.

BOSTON, Feb. 26.—Joseph Brigham, a wealthy gentleman of this city, was robbed to-day of $40,000 in notes, stocks, and bonds, at his residence, No 1,038 Washington-street. Two men called and inquired for him, and while one engaged him in conversation in the parlor the other slipped up stairs into his room and succeeded in possessing himself of a small trunk in which the securities were, and escaped from the house. Mr. Brigham had but just returned from the vaults of the Security Deposit Company with the trunk, and it is supposed that he was seen and followed by the robbers. It is thought that the thieves will be unable to realize on their plunder, as steps were at once taken to stop the payment of the securities. On returning to his room Mr. Brigham at once missed his property, but both men had disappeared.

The securities stolen from Mr. Brigham, with the exception of a mortgage note for $6,000, were found at 9 o'clock this evening lying near the gate of the rear entrance to his residence, where the package had been thrown some time during the evening.

LOSSES BY FIRE.

Sunday morning the deaf and dumb institution, some miles from Council Bluffs, Iowa, was destroyed by fire, which caught probably from the gas. Before water could be supplied by the hose about the building, the fire had gained control of the upper portion and compelled the occupants, teachers, officers, and unfortunates to leave the building. There was no loss of life, and all of the 153 pupils escaped without serious injury, and with most of their effects. Some of the employes lost everything. Some of the buildings belonging to the institution remain, and will accommodate about half the children. The total loss is estimated at $100,000; no insurance.

Shortly after 6 o'clock yesterday morning a fire originated in some unascertained manner on the fourth floor of the building Nos. 455 and 457 Broadway, but was promptly extinguished. Ira Beard, dealer in millinery goods on the first floor, sustained a loss of $500 by water; fully insured. The stock of P. L. Trensen & Co., importers of cloth, on the second floor, was damaged to the extent of $2,000, and J. Maidhof, importer of fringes and trimmings, who occupied the third, fourth, and fifth floors, loses $5,000 on stock and fixtures. The building which is owned by W. T. Lloyd & Co., was damaged to the extent of $5,000.

A fire at Ripley, Butler County, Ohio, early Sunday morning destroyed B. F. Sayers' building and contents and damaged the adjoining building. Sayers' loss is $3,500, and the insurance $1,500. J. C. Lindley occupied the first floor. His loss is $5,400; insurance, $3,600. The upper stories were occupied as a hall and lodge-rooms by the Odd Fellows, whose loss is $1,200; insurance, $800. The loss to the adjoining building is $1,200; insurance, $800.

A fire occurred at 1 o'clock yesterday morning on the first floor of No. 38 Baxter-street, occupied by Harris Steinberg as a clothing store. Damage to stock, $400. Solomon Harris, a shoe dealer in the basement of the building, sustained a loss of $100, and the building was damaged to the amount of $100.

The Merchants' Hotel at Rondout, N. Y., a fine new building in the upper part of the city, was destroyed by fire Sunday. The building was unoccupied since last Fall, the proprietor having failed. No cause is known for the origin of the fire. The loss is probably $30,000; insurance $14,500.

A fire in the ink factory of John G. Lightbody, No. 540 West Thirty-third-street, yesterday afternoon, caused $300 damage.

A fire at Mexia, Texas, Sunday night, destroyed five business houses. The loss is $50,000.

INTERFERING WITH RAILROAD TRAFFIC.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Feb. 26.—A gang of 30 or 40 men tore up the switches on the west side of the Dutchess and Columbia Railroad track at Dutchess Junction yesterday, putting a stop to the transfer of coal across the river at that point. This is part of an attempt to force the western terminus of the road to Deuning's Point.

COLLISION BETWEEN WHITES AND BLACKS.

NEW-ORLEANS, Feb. 26.—A dispatch from New-Iberia to Gov. Packard, from O. De La Hasaye, Jr., says: "A collision took place between the whites and blacks yesterday at Jeanerette, both parties under arms. A few soldiers to keep the peace might prevent a great deal of bloodshed. Great excitement prevails.

THE LANDIS CHILDREN.

TRENTON, Feb. 26.—Judge Reed, of the Supreme Court, decided this morning that Charles P. Landis is discharged from the custody of his children, and that they must be given into the custody of Clara M. Landis, his wife, and there to remain until they attain the age of 7 years. The parties and children were in court during the reading of the opinion.

A SECOND TRIAL FOR MURDER.

CONCORD, Feb. 26.—The second trial of Joseph Lapage, for the murder of Josie A. Langmaid, at Pembroke, Oct. 4, 1875, began to-day. At the former trial Lapage was found guilty and sentenced to be hanged. A new trial on exceptions was granted.

SHOT DEAD BY AN OFFICER.

LOUISVILLE, Feb. 26.—At Lebanon, Ky., last night a Deputy Marshal and posse, who were looking for parties suspected of robbing houses, came upon John Lynch and demanded his surrender. He refused to give himself up, and fired upon the posse, but hit no one. The shot was returned with fatal effect, Lynch being killed almost instantly.

STATE BOUNTY DEBT.

ALBANY, Feb. 26.—Controller Olcott announces that he will anticipate in full, commencing to-morrow, 27th inst., the payment of $2,000,000 of the county debt stock. This debt has been reduced $5,000,000 since Jan. 1, and there is now outstanding $4,557,000.

THE CUBAN SUGAR CROP.

HAVANA, Feb. 26.—It has been raining continuously three days, which is unusual for this season. The country roads are impassable, and the hauling of cane to the mills is temporarily prevented. This will consequently decrease the sugar yield, and arrivals at ports will be small for a fortnight.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT.

A CONTINUOUS OVATION FROM FREMONT TO COLUMBUS.

GOV. HAYES' RETURN TO COLUMBUS—HIS RAILWAY TRIP—THOUSANDS OF PEOPLE CONGREGATED TO DO HIM HONOR—NOT YET DEFINITELY DECIDED WHEN HE WILL LEAVE FOR WASHINGTON—HIS PERSONAL INTEREST IN THE RESULT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

COLUMBUS, Feb. 26.—Gov. Hayes returned from Fremont, Ohio, this evening, arriving in the city at 10 o'clock. The trip from Fremont here, a distance of 130 miles, was a continuous ovation. At every station on the route where the cars stopped, the people had gathered in large numbers to greet the President elect, and to bid farewell to the retiring Governor whom they had thrice honored with the chief magistracy of Ohio. The ovation was repeated at Clyde, Tiffin, Forrest, Canton, Bellefontaine, and Springfield, and at each place Gov. Hayes responded briefly to the cordial greetings of his friends and neighbors, expressing his gratitude for their kindly wishes in his behalf. The longest stop was made at Springfield, where the Governor made quite a little speech, which was received with great favor. The Governor was accompanied on the trip from Fremont by Mrs. Hayes and two children, and on their arrival in Columbus the party were met by a few friends, and conveyed to the Executive Mansion in Broad-street, opposite the State-house. It is not definitely decided when Gov. Hayes will take his departure for Washington, but he will probably leave here on Thursday noon, and go by the way of Pittsburg and Harrisburg. He will not resign his office of Governor of Ohio until he is declared President, as he does not wish to do anything that would look like anticipating the final decision of the Electoral Commission. During the whole period since his election last November he has been quietly attending to his duties as Governor of Ohio, and has apparently shown less personal interest than any man in the country in the result of the manifold and persistent attempts of his political enemies to cheat him out of his election; but he is not ignorant of the merits of the case, or where the real truth and justice of

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

THE INSURANCE COMPLICATIONS.

HOW THE PROPERTY OF LUTHER W. FROST WAS TRANSFERRED—THE REINSURANCE OF THE CONTINENTAL IN THE NEW-JERSEY MUTUAL.

Nothing is yet known of the whereabouts of Luther W. Frost, the former President of the Continental Life Insurance Company, who is said to have left Yonkers about three weeks ago, and against whom suit has been instituted by Mr. William R. Grace, the Receiver, for the recovery of $622,204 65. It has been asserted that Mr. Frost, prior to his departure for unknown parts, disposed of all his property with a view of avoiding the payment of any judgment that might be recovered against him, and although this is denied, the fact that several pieces of property in Yonkers were conveyed to other persons than his wife during the month of January looks somewhat suspicious. For this reason these persons, among whom were Maria L. Tyler, Mr. Frost's mother-in-law, and Mr. Minnot Mitchell, his real estate broker, were made parties to the suit, and the Receiver seeks to have the assignments set aside. Mr. Mitchell yesterday stated to a reporter of THE TIMES that the property on Babcock-place, conveyed to him by Mr. Frost, consisted of four lots, and a house which had perhaps cost $4,000 to erect. He had lived there since December, 1875, and the conveyance was the result of an agreement between himself and Mr. Frost, which was entered into at the time the property was purchased from Dr. Seward, who was its former owner. The transfer of the property on Riverdale-avenue, Mr. Mitchell said, was also a bona fide transaction, and he expressed his willingness to produce the checks that were given to Mr. Frost in payment therefor. The premises that were conveyed to Mrs. Maria L. Tyler, on North Broadway, Yonkers, were, he stated, purchased by Mr. Frost for $14,000, and he (Mr. Mitchell) knew that Mrs. Tyler had paid for them, the amount being, he thought, about $13,000. This was more than the property was really worth at the present time, and he did not think that amount could be realized by its sale. Much difficulty was experienced, he added, in effecting a rental of the property so that a percentage could be realized on the amount paid for it. The only other real estate that Mr. Frost is known to have assigned is on Palisade-avenue, where he resided, and this has been conveyed to his wife, Juliet D. T. Frost, who is also a party to the suit. Mr. Mitchell is evidently a firm believer in the honesty of Mr. Frost, for he hazarded the opinion that much difficulty would be experienced in recovering a judgment against that gentleman.

Mr. William Fullerton yesterday transferred to Mr. L. L. Coudert, of counsel for the Receiver, over $100,000 worth of bonds and mortgages which he had received from the New-Jersey Mutual Life Insurance Company. Shortly after the appointment of John J. Anderson as Receiver of the Continental, he discovered from the books that about $315,000 in securities had been transferred to the New-Jersey Mutual in consideration of the reinsurance of certain policies. Some of these policies were reinsured and others were canceled, the New-Jersey company taking up the risks themselves on new policies of their own issue. When Mr. Anderson concluded to bring suit for the recovery of these securities, a question was raised as to the amount for which the New-Jersey Mutual could be held liable, and through Daniel J. Noyes, who was acting as his counsel, it was learned that the officers were willing to return a large amount of them. Mr. Fullerton was then consulted, and it was agreed that suit should be brought for a merely nominal amount, and in this way the compromise was effected, and $123,000 worth of mortgages were secured, and these as above stated were handed over to Receiver Grace yesterday, under the order made by Judge Pratt on Wednesday last.

The hearing in the matter of the Continental before Referee William Allen Butler will be resumed to-day, when it is understood an effort will be made to bring it to a termination.

THE CASE OF THE NEW-JERSEY MUTUAL.

For some days past no negotiations have taken place between ex-Gov. Parker, the Receiver of the New-Jersey Mutual Life Insurance Company, and its officers, or Benjamin Noyes, the President of the National Capital Company, who is supposed to be still in possession of the assets transferred to him by Jeremiah H. Stedwell, and although Noyes has written a letter stating that he was ready and willing to turn over the securities, it is generally believed that some little difficulty will be experienced in recovering all of them. Neither Stedwell nor Daniel J. Noyes, for whom warrants have been issued, have yet been arrested, and nothing is known of their whereabouts, though they are believed to be in Boston or Philadelphia. In an interview last evening, ex-Gov. Parker stated that he knew nothing of their whereabouts, but intimated that he was in communication with them through an intermediary, and he expects to be in receipt of definite information in a few days as to when the assets of the New-Jersey Mutual, among which there is said to be $150,000 in United States bonds, will be placed in his possession.

INSURANCE NOTES.

In the report of the decision of Judge Benedict in the suit of Kate J. Bayliss against the Travelers Life Insurance Company, of Hartford, published in THE TIMES of Sunday, it was stated that a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. This was erroneous, judgment having been ordered for the company.

The newly appointed Superintendent of the Insurance Department of this State, Mr. J. F. Smythe, came to this City yesterday, and in company with Mr. John A. McCall visited the office of the Equitable Company, which is at present under examination.

Mr. Charles E. Appleby, the Receiver of the Metropolitan Fire Insurance Company, of this City, which went into liquidation some time ago, will file his report at an early day. Mr. Appleby states that as yet he has discovered nothing to cause him to change his opinion regarding the condition of the company and believes that the stockholders will receive from 60 to 75 cents on the dollar. The risks of the company have been reinsured in the Continental.

ANNUAL BALL OF THE EREHOLUNG CLUB.

A merry party assembled at Irving Hall last evening, the occasion being the annual ball of the "Erholung" Club, a German social association organized for the purposes of entertainment and amusement. The ball was in honor of King Carnival, and was a thorough burlesque on civilization. The maskers represented every species of humanity, and—it might be said—inhumanity. A King was gossiping with a menial negro; a Queen had for her escort a clownish lout; Prince Bismarck had to submit to the insult of a cut across his back from a harlequin's wand, while a little dauseuse capered around the icy exterior of a pious monk. Faust danced with Nan the Good for Nothing; King Lear was crazy enough to make love to a handsome flower girl, and General Boum flirted with Lady Macbeth. The Floor Committee consisted of Messrs. Ferdinand Kahn, Chairman; Leon Ullman, A. N. Berenther, E. D. Nayer, Joseph Lowenstein, H. Hirschberg, D. Langsaeter, Julius Wooll, D. Hellman, and S. Cohn. The Reception Committee was managed by Mr. A. Luchs, and the supper arrangements of Gen. Funk were all that could be desired.

MASKERS AT THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

A brilliant spectacle was presented at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night, the occasion being the eleventh annual masked ball of the Brooklyn Saengerbund. The ball is one of the principal social events of the season in the City of Churches, and is to Brooklyn what the Liederkranz is to New-York. At 10 o'clock the ball was opened with a grand march, participated in by about 300 merry maskers, personating every type of character known to ancient and modern times. The costumes were of the richest. After the march the dancing commenced, and the fun grew fast and furious. Fresh arrivals of strangely accoutred men and women came pouring in, until not only the dancing-hall but the lobbies were crowded with the jolly revelers. The arrangements under the supervision of Messrs. Charles Auerbach, George Kunckel, Henry Wagner, George Dedrich, Henry Hammer, Henry Hirsch, Louis Vogel and J. H. Wander were admirable. The dancing was kept up until an early hour this morning. The ball was equal if not superior, both as a splendid spectacle and an occasion of genuine amusement, to any of those which preceded it.

THE NEWARK POISONING CASE.

Coroner Osborne, of Newark, yesterday finished the testimony in the inquest over the remains of Thomas Ryan, one of the Brock murderers, who died in his cell on the day of the execution. Deputy Sheriff Freeman testified that he had charge of Ryan all the day previous and on the morning of the execution; up to 3 o'clock nothing particular occurred, except that Ryan was taken sick, and one time said, "Mr. Freeman, I am poisoned, and am going to die;" witness said that he was wrong, and he answered, "Oh, I am;" he drank several glasses of beer, and complained that his stomach burned him terribly. Tevelin and Boel, the watchmen at the jail, testified that they saw nothing pass into Ryan's cell. Edward Mulligan, a reporter, testified that he had free access to the jail, and was never searched; he had seen apples, oranges, water, and all kinds of articles handed into the cells of the men without being examined; Mrs. Osobwald had informed him that a man had visited her and offered to produce the real murderer for $1,000. William Carson, a special watchman, testified that Ryan's uncle visited the cell Wednesday, and two hours later Ryan said that he had been poisoned; everything handed to witness was given to the prisoners without being examined; he never saw anything examined. Capt. Rieche, keeper of the jail, testified that he examined none of the bundles, because he knew of no law that compelled him to do so. County Physician Ward testified that he had had the stomach of the deceased analyzed, and from six to eight grains of arsenic had been found; it is probable that twice that quantity was taken; in his opinion Ryan died from arsenical poisoning. Col. Johnson, Warden of the jail, testified that he had given orders to have all parcels examined, but his orders were not obeyed. This ended the testimony, and the inquest was adjourned until to-day, when the case will be given to the jury.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF SALARIES—A NEW GRADE RECOMMENDED WHICH WOULD EFFECT A LARGE SAVING.

The Board of Education held a special session yesterday afternoon, to consider and receive the report of the Committee on Salaries and Economies, upon the subject of providing means to cover the sum of $89,752, the amount of the reduction from the sum of $2,780,752, asked for by the board, and the appropriation of $2,700,000 made by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment for the current year. The report stated that the committee had been compelled to accept the inevitable fact that the salaries of teachers must be rearranged according to a more equitable plan than that now in practice, in such a manner as to cover the deficit still unprovided for. If the plan submitted should be approved, it would make a reduction of $42,541 67.

The reduction of the salaries was at the rate of two-twelfths from the gross amount paid in each department, which it is not considered will seriously lower the individual salaries of the majority of teachers, but in many cases their salaries will be increased. The saving effected by this plan, $42,541 67, added to the sum of $37,288, the amount reached by the aggregate reduction of the salaries of the janitors in the public schools, or 10 per cent. of the salary of each employe; the reduction of the salary of the Engineer of the Board of Education from $4,000 to $2,500; and the abolition of the positions of special teachers of science and philosophy in the schools of the Fifteenth Ward, after March 1, next, reaches the sum of $79,829 67.

The salaries were graded as follows: Male department, eight grades, commencing at $1,100 and terminating at $600; female department, eight grades, from $950 to $600; primary department, six grades, from $700 to $500. Considerable debate followed the motion to adopt the report. Mr. West said that according to this report, the Principals and Vice Principals who received the highest salaries were not reduced, while the reduction fell upon the assistant teachers and janitors. On motion, the board went into Committee of the Whole, and reported progress on the report. After the board had reconvened, President Wood left the chair and spoke in favor of having the schedules of salaries printed, so that each member might study them at his leisure. He said in one instance he had discovered that a poor girl's salary was reduced at "one fell swoop" from $780 to $600, and other equally unjust examples were cited.

Mr. Walker, Chairman of the committee, spoke at considerable length in favor of the report as submitted. He was not in favor of going to the expense of printing the schedules when any one could find out the information from the Manual. He was in favor of removing the privilege of fixing the salaries from the Trustees to the board, as provided by the report, and he had ascertained from the Trustees themselves that they were in favor of the proposed mode.

Mr. Kelly did not think that any gentleman was in favor of paying $4,000 salary to an engineer when one could be readily obtained for $1,000.

Mr. Wheeler considered the reduction of the salaries of the janitors and others, now employment was purely mechanical, a good movement, but he thought that the payment of each particular teacher in each particular school should be left to the Trustees of that school. Uniformity was a good thing, but it could not be secured among the teachers, and he hardly thought it wise to attempt to secure uniformity in the grade of salaries. He was in favor of reducing the salaries of the immediate employes of the Board.

Commissioner Beardsley said that the salaries of their officers were reduced about two years ago. It was originally intended to pay $2,500 for an engineer, but in some way the present incumbent was appointed at his present salary.

A vote was taken on the question of printing the schedules, and lost by a vote of 11 to 8.

Commissioner Wheeler offered a resolution providing that the public schools, excepting the High School, should be closed during the months of October, November, and December, thus saving the sum of $60,000. The matter was referred to the Committee on Evening Schools. The report of the Committee on Salaries and Economies was, on motion, referred to the Committee on By-laws, with instructions to report next Wednesday. An adjournment was then taken.

PARENTS DESERTING THEIR CHILD.

The insane woman who attempted to drown herself at the foot of Delancey-street on Sunday afternoon, and who is now at Bellevue Hospital, was recognized yesterday as Mrs. Fanny Brown, the wife of Adam Brown, a 'longshoreman employed at Pier No. 45, North River. Mrs. Brown, who is reported to be an habitual drunkard, lodged, with her husband and child, in a furnished room at the boarding-house of Mrs. Harding, No. 271 Spring-street. In consequence of the dissipated habits of Mrs. Brown, the family had become obnoxious to the landlady, and in compliance with a request from her were to have left the house at the end of the present month. On Saturday morning, the husband left the boarding-house apparently with the intention of going to his work, and about an hour after his departure, Mrs. Brown went out. The couple were not seen again by Mrs. Harding on Saturday or during the following day, but the landlady, presuming that they were in their room, paid little attention to the fact of their non-appearance. Later in the day, she became suspicious that all was not right, and accordingly visited the room rented by the Browns, where she found their infant lying on the floor in an exhausted condition, and entirely nude. She carried the child down stairs, fed it, and subsequently, finding that its parents had not returned, surrendered it to the care of the Police of the Eighth Precinct, who placed it in charge of Mrs. Webb, the Matron at Police Head-quarters. It is believed that Brown has either run away from his wife, or that he was committed to prison on a charge of intoxication.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate the resignation of Mr. Thurman from the Electoral Commission was presented, and Mr. Kernan was elected to fill the vacancy unanimously. The Senate then went into joint session with the House to continue the count of the Electoral votes, and, after counting Pennsylvania, withdrew to consider the objection to a Rhode Island Elector. After brief debate the Senate voted to count the vote, unanimously, of the Elector with the others. The Senate again went into joint session with the House, and Rhode Island was counted. The votes were counted for Hayes and Wheeler. Objections were made to the South Carolina vote, and the houses separated and the papers were sent to the Electoral Commission. Legislative business was resumed, the appropriation bills taking most attention. A resolution to proceed to the election of a President of the Senate pro tem. was introduced, and will come up in a few days.

The House devoted some time to discussing the question of reading the testimony taken by the Elections Committee relating to the appointment of Mr. Boggs, an Elector from Pennsylvania, in place of Mr. Morrell. It was decided to read the testimony, and then debate ensued on the counting of the votes of Pennsylvania, during which there was much excitement in the House. The House finally voted not to count the votes for Hayes and Wheeler in the joint session, but both houses not having concurred in the objection, the votes (29) were counted for Hayes and Wheeler. Objection was next made to counting the vote of Rhode Island owing to the alleged ineligibility of Mr. Slater, an Elector, and the houses separated. A motion to take a recess was negatived, and after some discussion the vote of the Elector was counted. A motion to take a recess till 10 A. M. to-morrow was offered, and a point of order made against it which the Speaker sustained. A motion to meet the Senate was carried, and in the joint session Rhode Island was counted for Hayes. The next State was South Carolina, from which two certificates of Electors were opened. Objections were made from both sides, and the papers were sent to the Commission, when the House took a recess till to-morrow morning.

SENATE.

THE ELECTORAL COUNT.

The Senate assembled at 10 o'clock, but no legislative business was transacted. As the objection in the case of Mr. Morrell, the Pennsylvania Elector, was disposed of on Saturday, the Senate awaited the action of the House of Representatives on that matter.

At 1:30 o'clock the President pro tem. laid before the Senate a letter from Judge Clifford, President of the Electoral Commission, announcing the resignation of Hon. Allen G. Thurman, member of the Commission, on account of physical inability to discharge the duties of the position, and inclosing a copy of a resolution adopted by the Commission this morning, to inform the Senate of that fact, in order that the vacancy might be filled.

Mr. MCDONALD, of Indiana, submitted a resolution, appointing Hon. Francis Kernan, a Senator from the State of New-York, a member of the Commission in place of Mr. Thurman, and it was unanimously agreed to.

At 3:10 P. M. Mr. Adams, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared in the Senate and notified that body of the action of the House in the Pennsylvania case, and that the House was now ready to meet the Senate for the purpose of resuming the count. The Senate then proceeded to the hall of the House.

THE RHODE ISLAND OBJECTIONS.

Upon returning at 3:30 o'clock, the PRESIDENT pro tem. announced that the Senate retired from the joint meeting upon an objection made to the certificate of Rhode Island.

The Secretary then read the objection to the vote of WILLIAM S. SLATER appointed Elector by the Legislature in place of George H. Corliss.

Mr. BURNSIDE, of Rhode Island, submitted a resolution that the vote of W. S. Slater be counted with the other votes of the Electors of Rhode Island, notwithstanding the objections made thereto.

Mr. BAYARD, of Delaware, spoke at some length on the case of New-York, and objected to admission that the course taken by that State in calling her Legislature, and in the appointment of a man to fill the office of Elector, was regular and in accordance with law, in accordance with the Constitution, and was but a confirmation and fortification of the view which he believed was held previous to this session of Congress.

The resolution of Mr. BURNSIDE was unanimously agreed to—yeas 57, nays none.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, the Secretary was directed to notify the House of Representatives of the action of the Senate.

SOUTH CAROLINA REACHED.

At 5:55 o'clock the Clerk of the House again appeared and notified the Senate of the action of the House in the Rhode Island case, and also that the House was now ready to receive the Senate and resume the count. The Senate then left its chamber, and, upon returning at 6:30, the PRESIDENT pro tem. announced that the Senate having retired from the joint meeting of the two houses upon an objection submitted to the certificate from South Carolina, and the papers having been submitted to the Electoral Commission, the Senate would now resume its legislative business.

LEGISLATIVE BUSINESS.

Messrs. Windom, Allison, and Davis were appointed members of the Conference Committee on the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive Appropriation bill; Messrs. Sargent, Windom, and Withers on the Deficiency Appropriation bill; and Messrs. Sargent, Cragin, and Wallace on the Naval Appropriation bill.

THE LATE SPEAKER KERR.

Mr. MCDONALD, of Indiana, gave notice that at 10:30 o'clock to-morrow morning he would call up the resolutions of the House in respect to the memory of the late Speaker KERR.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, submitted a resolution that the Senate do now proceed to the election of a President pro tempore. Laid on the table, and he gave notice that he would call it up for consideration at an early day.

Mr. ALLISON, of Iowa, submitted the report of the Conference Committee on the Indian Appropriation bill, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate the Pacific Railroad Funding Bill, in order that it should be the unfinished business to-morrow.

The Senate then went into executive session, and when the doors were reopened took a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THE ELECTORAL VOTE OF PENNSYLVANIA

The House met at 10 o'clock, but it was nearly 12 before any business was proceeded with, the interval being consumed in a call of the House and in voting by yeas and nays on the question whether the testimony taken before the Committee on the Privileges of the House in the case of the Pennsylvania Elector, Boggs—appointed instead of Daniel J. Morrell, Centennial Commissioner—should be read. The House decided by a vote of 133 to 110 that it should be read, and it was accordingly read.

Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, offered a resolution that the vote of Boggs should be counted, and Mr. Stenger, of Pennsylvania, offered a substitute that it should not be.

Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, said that the objection was based on principles so often overruled on the law, that his side of the House could submit the question without discussion.

Mr. SPENGER, of Pennsylvania, took the ground that under the Constitution and under the laws of Pennsylvania, Henry K. Boggs was not entitled to cast his vote as Elector from the State of Pennsylvania.

At 12:10 the Speaker interrupted the proceedings and announced the beginning of a new legislative day, which was thereupon opened by the Chaplain with prayer.

The journal of Saturday having then been read, the discussion was resumed.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New-York, said he desired to say a few words for the country, which he considered as far transcending in importance any party. For more than a year the two great parties had been engaged in a hand to hand struggle for supremacy to the neglect of great and important public questions. He thought it high time to stop and inquire into the cost of such partisanship, and particularly the cost of continuing it for another year. He know that gentlemen on the Democratic side had pledged themselves to accept the decision of the Electoral Commission. Why, then, this delay? If this question were submitted to twelve, twelve hundred, or twelve hundred thousand men of common sense their verdict would be that there was nothing, absolutely nothing, in it. Why then, on the verge of such a prodigious crisis, wait another moment? He would not defend the Louisiana Returning Board, but he believed that the Electoral Commission could have made no other decision than it had made, and he also thought that, as between Louisiana and Oregon, "honors were easy."

Mr. SCALES, of North Carolina, criticised the action of the President in the selection as the Visiting Committee to New-Orleans such men as Mr. Hale, of Maine, the son-in-law of the Chairman of the Republican National Committee, Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, and Senator Sherman, of Ohio, the political and personal friends of Mr. Hayes, and Stanley Mathews, the brother-in-law of Mr. Hayes. This he characterized as a miserable subterfuge and a base pretext for imposing on the American people. Such men as these had undertaken to whitewash J. Madison Wells and his associates. Returning Board. In regard to that he quoted the verse:

"The River Rhine, as is well known,
Doth wash the City of Cologne;
But tell me what, ye powers divine,
Shall thenceforth wash the River Rhine!"

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, referring to Mr. Chittenden's remark, that this was a trivial question, asked if the time had indeed come when a Constitutional objection was to be called trivial. It was a question of the gravest importance. Whenever a vote was given for an ineligible person, that vote was nugatory. He referred to some authorities on that point and then read the President's commission of Daniel J. Morrell as Centennial Commissioner. To be sure Morrill had not voted as Presidential Elector, but by the statutes of Pennsylvania the Governor was authorized to declare by proclamation the names of the Electors duly, lawfully, and constitutionally elected. Mr. Morrell could not have been elected, and therefore the Governor's proclamation that he had been was untrue, and there was no vacancy which the other Electors could fill.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, spoke of the approaching close of the stupendous farce, and declared that the Electoral Commission had yielded to the behests of a party, and had become the scorn and byword of all honest men. The majority of its members had violated their oaths, and there was no law to compel acquiescence in their decision. The House would be perfectly justified in resorting to every legal and constitutional means to annul the decision of this odious Commission.

Mr. HEWITT, of New-York, again returned to the charge which he had made on Saturday against the good faith of Mr. Hoar, of Massachusetts, for acting and voting in the Electoral Commission at variance with his speech in the House, and said that that gentleman, in his attempt to answer the charge on Saturday, had assumed the mantle of Webster, and tried (reversing the usual process) to eke out the fox's skin with the lion's hide. But even the mantle of Webster was not broad enough to cover defection, misrepresentation, and fraud. He cited the various propositions and votes in the Commission, showing that Mr. Hoar had uniformly voted against the admission of evidence to show fraud on the part of the Louisiana Returning Board, and he asked whether that [quoting Mr. Hoar's words] was "justice and righteousness." He [Mr. Hoar] had voted in the Louisiana case that the Commission had no judicial power, and in the case of Oregon that the Commission had power to take evidence as to whether the seal of the State was or was not the authentic seal, and as to whether Watts held a commission from the United States; but where there was an allegation of fraud, there he had voted that there was no power to prevent fraud. That gentleman had been on all occasions the great champion of justice and righteousness. His magnificent peroration in the Belknap impeachment case would long be read by the American youth, and yet that same gentleman had voted not to receive evidence of fraud. In conclusion, he said, I ask my Democratic friends—deceived, defrauded, cheated, as they have been—whether we should meet bad faith with bad faith? I answer that never ought the record of the Democratic Party be sullied by a single act that will make any man blush. I went on that committee against my will. I knew that whatever I did that committee would be subject to misconstruction; but when I took my place there I ceased to be a partisan. I tried to become a patriot. I tried to perfect a measure of justice, conciliation, and peace for the suffering people of this country. We perfected it. We brought it here. It has been approved by Congress and by the country, and now shall we stop in this career toward the solution of the greatest problem ever presented to a free people because we have been met with fraud and injustice on the other side? I say no! Let us give to the people of the country and of the world an example that, having been cheated, we can still trust in the providence and justice of God and in the disposition and determination of the people to do justice in the end. [Applause and commotion.] We have still a free ballot-box and a free press, and we are still a free people, and no justification for revolution, no justification for civil war can ever arise among a free people until they are deprived of the remedy of the ballot-box.

Mr. O'BRIEN, of Maryland—How long will you be free if Mr. Hayes goes in?

Mr. HEWITT (not noticing the interruption)—To that remedy I propose to resort, and if that remedy be found in vain, although I am the humblest of Democrats, and the most feeble of citizens, I will be ready to take my arms and lead, if necessary, or rather serve, in the crusade against injustice, oppression, and tyranny.

While Mr. Hewitt was speaking he was surrounded by a circle of members of both political parties, and the evidences of excitement and commotion were manifest in the circle and all over the hall, and in the galleries. As he finished Mr. CATE, of Wisconsin, made his way through the circle and addressing Mr. Hewitt in an excited manner said: "You have pronounced the action of the Commission to be infamous, a gross betrayal of the confidence reposed in it; a perversion of right and justice. Do you now declare it to be the duty of Democrats to assist in the speedy consummation of what you pronounce an outrage?"

Mr. HEWITT—I say that I will yield to it because I see no other course left but anarchy.

Mr. CATE—And I say to you, sir, assert that it is the duty of Democrats to oppose it by every means in their power. It would be cowardice to do otherwise. [Great excitement and confusion.]

Mr. YEATES, of North Carolina, forced his way through the circle, and with flushed face and excited manner said, addressing himself to Mr. Cate, and the Democrats who were opposing acquiescence: "Those who denounce us now as cowards, when the pinch came 15 years ago, turned against us.

The excitement had grown so intense at this time, reviving recollections of the scenes in the House immediately before its rebellious, that the Speaker felt called upon to interpose and insist upon a restoration of order. When he had succeeded, Mr. TOWNSEND, of New-York, took the floor and compared the action of the Democrats to the familiar bargain between the white man and the Indian, the white man saying: "You were unconstitutional, and you will take the turkey, and you will take the owl; or you will take the owl and I will take the turkey." [Laughter.] So if the Commission would decide in favor of Tilden, the Democrats would stand faithfully by it, but if it decided in favor of Hayes, then they would howl and resist. Was that the way that honorable men discharged public duties? He referred to the saying of Judge Grover, of the New-York Court of Appeals, in reference to the outcry made against the decision of the court in the Tweed case, that in Allegheny County, (where the Judge lived,) when a man was beaten in a lawsuit, it was understood that there were but two things he could do, one was to appeal, and the other was to go down to the tavern and swear at the court. [Laughter.] The gentlemen from Kentucky and New-York [Messrs. Jones and Hewitt] had exercised to-day the latter privilege. They had sworn at the court, not in the tavern, but in the House of Assembly. He believed that that was not the feeling of the people. They had faith in the tribunal. Whether the tribunal had decided right or wrong, he called on the other side of the House in the name of country, of patriotism, of honor, of manhood to do what the Republicans would have been required to do in case the decision had been against them.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, thought that sad times had fallen upon the country when gentlemen could declare openly that any thing incorporated in the Constitution by the fathers of the Republic was trivial. Referring to the Electoral Commission, he said that the question could never be answered to the satisfaction of the people why it was that the Commission had admitted evidence in the case of Oregon and had refused it in the case of Louisiana.

Mr. BERRE, of New-York, left called upon to raise his solemn protest against the illegal, iniquitous fraud which was being attempted to be perpetrated upon the people of the Republic. The Commission had been raised to strip the mantle of fraud from the votes of Louisiana. It had been derelict in its duties, and history would mention it in terms of bitter denunciation. He would, in conclusion, submit to the decision, merely taking an appeal to the will of the people.

Mr. CAULFIELD, of Illinois, sent to the Clerk's desk and had read resolutions of the Chicago Democratic Club, asking that a new election be ordered.

Mr. POPPLETON, of Ohio, sent up and had read amid much laughter, the speech delivered at Fremont on Saturday by Gov. Hayes.

Mr. BUCKNER, of Missouri, said that he had voted for the Electoral bill confiding in the impartiality of the five Judges of the Supreme Court But instead of deciding questions as Judges, they had decided as partisans and as a packed jury.

Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, who was not in the hall when Mr. Hewitt made his speech, but who had had the notes of it read by the official reporter, replied to it as a posthumous speech, prepared during the Sabbath. He asserted that Mr. Hewitt had had the fullest means of knowledge, by three days' companionship with him on the Electoral Committee, that the right to go into the ascertainment of the facts as to who had been lawfully elected was utterly denied. If that gentleman were a sane man, with ordinary intelligence, it was utterly incredible that he should have understood the matter as he now professed to understand it. This branch of a great party, intrusted with its interests and its leadership, what did he now say? That in opposition to every public utterance and assurance that came from the Republican side, he had gone into the matter because he had got the assurance of some scoundrel that it would come out all right. He [Hoar] wanted no other evidence of the utter delusion and folly that prompted the charge against him than that the gentleman [Hewitt] had himself furnished. Prophecy was not one of the exact sciences, but he [Hoar] would venture the prophecy that there would not be an event in the history of the country which would be in the future more gratifying to the American people than the constitutional assertion of the limit between State and national authority which that Electoral Commission had made. If the Democratic Party, under the excitement of to-day, inflamed with the ecstasy of passion for power, disapproved and condemned it, he would "appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober." He would appeal from the party maddened, excited, drunk in the present, to its future and to its past. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, closed the debate with an argument against the decision of the Commission.

The vote was then taken on Mr. Stenger's substitute for Mr. Kelley's resolution, and it was adopted—yeas 135, nays 119.

So the House decided that the vote of Mr. Boggs should not be counted, because he was not appointed in conformity with the Constitution and laws of Pennsylvania.

THE JOINT SESSION.

The Senate was notified of the vote and of the readiness of the House to meet the Senate in joint session, and at 3:15 the Senators entered the hall and took their seats as usual.

The Presiding Officer called the meeting to order, and the action of each house having been read, he announced—the two houses not having concurred otherwise—the vote of Pennsylvania would be counted.

Senator ALLISON, one of the tellers, thereupon announced that the State of Pennsylvania had given 29 votes for Hayes and Wheeler.

RHODE ISLAND.

The certificate from Rhode Island was then read, showing four votes for Hayes and Wheeler. The presiding officer asked whether there was objection to the vote of Rhode Island being counted?

Mr. O'BRIEN, of Maryland, on behalf of himself and other Representatives and Senators, presented objections to the vote of WILLIAM S. SLATER, setting forth that Slater was not duly appointed Elector; that George H. Corliss, according to the decision of the Electoral Commission in the Watts case, was duly appointed Elector, and the substitution for him was illegal; that if, in any event, it was competent to complete the Electoral College, it could only have been done under the law as announced by the Electoral Commission.

The Senate then withdrew. As soon as order was restored, Mr. POPPLETON, of Ohio, moved that the House take a recess till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Rejected—yeas 83, nays 172. The following is the affirmative vote:

Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, J. B. Bagley, Banning, Blackburn, Bliss, Bright, Boone, Bradford, Caldwell of Alabama, Caldwell of Tennessee, Caulfield, Cate, Clarke of Kentucky, Clark of Missouri, Clymer, Collins, Cook, Cochrane, Cowan, Cox, Culberson, Davis, Dibrell, DeBolt, Douglass, Field, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Glover, Harris of Georgia, Hamilton of Indiana, Hatcher, Henkle, Hooker, House, Humphreys, Hurd, Jenks, Jones of Kentucky, Knott, Lane, Levy, Luttrell, Lynde, Maish, McMahon, Meade, Money, Morrison, Mutchler, O'Brien, Philips of Missouri, Poppleton, Rice, Riddle, Robbins of North Carolina, Roberts, Ross of New-Jersey, Sayler, Shanklev, Smith of Georgia, Southard, Sparks, Springer, Stanton, Stenger, Stone, Terry, Thompson, Turney, Vance of Ohio, Vance of North Carolina, Waddell, Walling, Walker of Virginia, Walsh, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Wyke, and J. S. Williams of Alabama—83.

Mr. WOOD, of New-York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the House had refused to take a recess and to lay that motion on the table, stating that he made the motion for the purpose of preventing any delay in counting the Electoral votes.

Mr. O'BRIEN, of Maryland, and Mr. KELLEY, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 182, nays 67.

Mr. O'BRIEN, of Maryland, offered a resolution declaring that the vote of WILLIAM S. SLATER should not be counted.

Mr. EAMES, of Rhode Island, offered as a substitute a resolution declaring that the vote of said Slater should be counted.

Mr. JENKS, of Pennsylv

for it, requiring the owners of the buildings to remove them. This the owners refused to do, and the City sold the buildings as they stood to the highest bidder. The plaintiff's store brought $1,500. The liability of the City for this purchase price not being disputed, an offer was made some time ago of this $1,500, including interest from the date of sale. This the plaintiff declined, thinking that by proving value he could recover more. Judge Van Brunt, however, directed a judgment in his favor for the $1,500 only, and with costs up to the time of the offer. The subsequent costs are to be paid by him. John E. Parsons and J. Hooker Hammersly appeared for the plaintiff, and Charles P. Miller for the City.

ARRESTED ON A CHARGE OF FORGERY.

Thomas H. Jarvis, aged 24, employed as a clerk in the World office, was arraigned on the charge of forgery yesterday at the Washington Place Police Court. The affidavit against him set forth that on Sept. 23, last, Jarvis, while in the employ of a blind man named Henry M. Addey, of No. 135 East Thirty-fifth-street, obtained $18 27 from Messrs. Banga & Co., auctioneers, No. 656 Broadway, under the following circumstances: Mr. Addey, having some valuable books which he desired to dispose of, placed them in the auction rooms of Banga & Co. On Sept. 23, Jarvis, it is alleged, sent a note purporting to have been signed by Mr. Addey to the auctioneers, requesting them to send him the amount for which the books had been sold, a request with which they complied by sending the amount specified in the complaint, and it is charged that Jarvis pocketed the money. Soon after this transaction the accused left Addey's employ, and the officer who was assigned to look out for him traced the accused to the World office. He pleaded not guilty, but was committed in default of $1,000 bail.

Adjourned until Thursday, March 1, at 12 o'clock.

DECISIONS.

SUPREME COURT—CHAMBERS.

By Judge Lawrence.

McManus vs. Reilly.—The former judgment would appear to be conclusive against the defense sought to be maintained in this action. As the defendant, however, does not appear to have been represented by counsel when the interlocutory adjustment with the Sheriff at the time the motion was denied and the inquest taken, I will give him an opportunity to be heard on condition that the judgment stand as security that he pay $10 costs of motion, and proceed to trial on Friday, March 2, 1877, making no application for a further postponement on any ground.

Hall vs. Stewart.—The affidavit presented should show in some manner not only that the plaintiff has made diligent efforts to serve the defendant, but also from whom the information as to the defendant's being in Europe is derived. As the affidavit stands, the allegation is that the plaintiff is informed and believes, &c. These defects must be supplied before the order can be granted.

The People, &c., vs. The Napa Quicksilver Mining Company.—In this case I desire to hear counsel. If there are no assets, and if all the former assets have been distributed by the Assignee in bankruptcy, I do not see the necessity for appointing a Receiver to receive the assets and distribute them among the stockholders.

In the Matter of Ludlow.—Motion to confirm the report of the referee granted.

In the Matter of Durfee, &c.—Memorandum for counsel.

Orders as Settled.—In the Matter of the American H.P. Mailing Company; In the Matter of Guardian Savings Bank.

Beard vs. Delafield.—Memorandum and motion for an allowance.

By Judge Davis.

Englemann vs. Englemann.—There should be a reference in this case to ascertain and report the amount unpaid. The court will not order judgment on the ex-parte affida vit of the plaintiff.

In the Matter of Mellen.—Hearing adjourned to Friday next; prisoner discharged.

Kedelsheimer vs. Kedelsheimer.—Decree of divorce granted to plaintiff.

Hofman vs. Burke.—I think the order staying the proceedings was improperly granted. It was forbidden by rule 81, and section 388 of the Code, if it authorizes the Judge to fix the amount of security to be given in order to stay proceedings, does not authorize the Judge to stay proceedings till such security be given. If a stay of proceedings may be given for the purpose of enabling a party to find sureties, one for as many weeks or months may be given. The stay seems to have been unauthorized and must be vacated. Motion granted with $10 costs.

By Judge Donohue.

Granted.—Lawrence vs. Tallmadge.

By Judge Barrett.

Smith vs. Adams.—I desire to see counsel.

EXTRAORDINARY SCENE IN A CHURCH.

Recently, at the Whitehaven Police Court, Rev. Edward S. Goodhart, of Harrington, Eng., summoned Mr. Abraham Kendall, a brewer and churchwarden of Harrington, for assaulting him in church, on Sunday evening, the 28th ult. Mr. Goodhart stated that he had a living in Owesby, Lincolnshire, but being in ill-health he had permission from the Bishop to stay at Harrington and officiate there. He had been in India, and had suffered from jungle fever, and was very nervous. On the night in question he was very unwell, and being short-sighted could not read the lessons well. After service, when he went into the vestry, Mr. Kendall said he was beastly drunk, and called him a scoundrel, telling him to "get out of this, you scoundrel." Mr. Kendall then seized hold of him by the coat and shoved him out of the church, making him fall on the pavement and injuring his wrist. He denied that he was drunk—all the drink he had that day was about six-penny worth of whisky mixed with eggs. Mr. Kendall also charged Mr. Goodhart with assaulting him. He said that as soon as he heard the clergyman begin to read the lessons he knew that something was wrong. Several persons left the church during the service, and from the manner in which the clergyman caught hold of the rail in ascending the pulpit he was sure he was drunk. He could make nothing of the clergyman's sermon or texts, and he understood from what he said he had been in a land where honey dropped from rocks and milk flowed from cows, [laughter] and he (Mr. Kendall) thought the clergyman had got a good lot of it that day. [Laughter.] He told Mr. Goodheart he was a disgrace to the church. The clergyman accused him of being drunk, and Mr. Kendall replied—"Well, the most drunken man must go out first." Both caught hold of each other by the coat collars, and the clergyman fell out of the door. Notwithstanding that Dr. Dick said the clergyman was suffering from nervousness, Mr. Kendall swore positively that he was drunk. He had been drinking rum or whisky. He called Mr. Goodheart a disgraceful drunkard, as he saw him stagger against the church door. Witnesses expressed the opinion that Mr. Goodheart was tipsy, but the Magistrates fined Mr. Kendall £15 for assault. The court was crowded.

Yesterday's proceedings in the House were marked by a more than usually violent ebullition of rage, disappointment, and bad language. The amiable JONES, of Kentucky, said that the majority of the Commission had violated their oaths, and had become "the scorn and by-word of honest men;" the far-sighted HEWITT, after counseling submission now, hinted dimly at the future possibility of being compelled to take up arms in "the crusade against injustice, oppression, and tyranny," while the belligerent CATE, of Wisconsin, worked himself into a fine frenzy over HEWITT'S postponement of the revolution, and wanted to have the work of the "infamous" Commission at once annulled, and denounced the "cowardice" of those who were ready to submit to the decision. Whereupon one of those Southern Democrats whose inconveniently long memories are frequently found embarrassing by their Northern allies, extinguished CATE and the wind-bag patriots with the remark that "those who denounce us now as cowards, when the pinch came fifteen years ago, turned against us." During all this rant and recrimination, the House was rapidly assuming the appearance of a bear-garden, and men's minds, if not their motives, were carried back to the scenes which ushered in secession and civil war. And yet the persons who behaved like a parcel of lunatics on the floor of the House of Representatives yesterday are simply disappointed litigants before a court which themselves have constituted, and by whose decision they were solemnly pledged to abide.

Of course, the questions affecting the eligibility of one of the Electors in Pennsylvania were lost sight of in the scrimmage, and the opportunity given to discuss these, as well as the equally ridiculous objection to a Rhode Island Elector, was used to ventilate stale diatribes about the Louisiana decision, the ruling in regard to Oregon, and the action of the Commission generally. The majority in the House sustained the objection to the vote of Pennsylvania; the Democrats in the Senate, with rather more regard to their reputation, refused to stultify themselves on that point. The vote of Rhode Island, after some pettifogging arguments in the House, was accepted by both houses. Then, after much useless expenditure of time and energy, the South Carolina returns were reached, and the Electoral Commission received the last installment of its work. There is no reason why that work should not be finished to-day, and still less why the labors of the Joint Convention, even if frivolous objections are made to Vermont and Wisconsin, should not terminate to-morrow. The fact that the ranks of the filibustering crowd are thinning out and that 20 who voted for a recess on Saturday voted against it to-day, encourages the hope that the result of the election, which was announced on conclusive evidence by THE TIMES of the 9th of November, should be formally accepted by Congress on the 28th of February.

At every lull in the noise of Electoral squabbling the hum of expectant office-seekers makes itself heard. There are at least seven hundred men who think they have "claims" for the seven Cabinet positions to be filled by President HAYES, while the name of applicants for less elevated positions is legion. The latter have not succeeded in grasping the fact that the immediate vacancies will be very few, and that the inevitable reorganization of the civil service on a basis of efficiency and non-partisanship will be as slow as it will be difficult. The aspirants for Cabinet positions seem to forget that Gen. HAYES will be apt to prefer for his associates men whom the appointments must seek, rather than those who intrigue for the appointments. It should be a conclusive argument against any man's fitness to take one of the foremost places under the new Administration that he is capable of either making personal solicitations for such a trust or of allowing his friends to importune for him. It is in the last degree impertinent for any politician or set of politicians to urge his or their "right" to be selected for high position on the ground that they assisted to make Gen. HAYES President. It was the people who did that work, and it is to the people alone that the next President will hold himself responsible for the selection of his advisers.

If the late Speaker KERR could have expressed any wish concerning the eulogies which might be pronounced over his grave, he certainly would have protested against important public business being retarded by them. The Senate has not yet taken any official action on the death of the Speaker, and Senator MCDONALD, of Indiana, now gives notice that he will call up the House resolutions on the subject, to which, of course, he proposes to speak at length. Time is very precious at this stage of the session, as several important appropriation bills are awaiting action. If the Senate had paid due honor to the memory of the dead Speaker, it would have long since eulogized his worth, and not have waited until this late day to wedge such a ceremony into the rush of the last moments of the session.

The compulsory reduction in the salaries of school-teachers effected through the action of the Board of Apportionment, shows how easily that body could have enforced economy in the salary list of every department of the City Government, had it been so disposed. The grossly extravagant salaries of court attendants, clerks, and messengers are in many cases protected by resolutions of the Ring Board of Supervisors, but no attempt was made to touch those which could have been reached, simply because the courts are filled with political bummers who do the dirty work of Tammany Hall at election time, in return for being billeted on the public for the rest of the year. The school teachers are not serviceable political workers, and such influence as they exert is not favorable to the continued existence of the ignorance and crime which form the corner-stone of the edifice of Tammany supremacy. It is highly characteristic of our City Administration that it should with one hand increase the grossly exorbitant salaries of men like "TOM" DUNLAP, "BILLY" BOYD, and "ED." GALE, while cutting down with the other the pay of our hard-worked and underpaid school-teachers.

ACCEPTANCE OR ANARCHY?

We cannot often concur in any version of a case which Mr. HEWITT puts forward, but for once he comes very near the truth. There is a certain degree of exaggeration in the alternative as he states it. The refusal of the Democratic representatives to abide by the decision of the Electoral Commission might not be followed by the anarchy he predicts, because the good sense of the country might even then interpose its influence in support of the solution of the difficulty which the Republican Senate would present. There can, however, be no doubt as to the tendency of the tactics which Mr. HEWITT, under a sudden accession of moderation, loudly condemns. The whole drift of the opposition is toward anarchy. No regard for consequences is apparent in the attacks upon the integrity of the Commission, calculated as they are to impair the moral efficacy of its judgment and the future usefulness of its judicial members; and the recklessness is yet more conspicuous in the contemptuous disregard of the difficulties which must follow if the labors of the Commission end in failure. So far, Mr. HEWITT'S estimate of the conduct of his more boisterous brethren is correct. They are, as he declares them to be, anarchists, and the country will not forget that every one of them is a Democrat, and that the revolutionary course they are pursuing is only an application of the methods of helping Mr. TILDEN which Mr. HEWITT has encouraged ever since the defeat last November.

Logically, too, the anarchists have an advantage over Mr. HEWITT. Their most violent utterances in regard to the conduct of the Commission he indorses. Like Mr. BAYARD and other of the more moderate Democratic leaders, he assails the motives and actions of the majority of the Commission in terms that are as gross as they are unjust. They are held up to public odium and hatred as betrayers of a great trust, whose verdict must, indeed, be accepted as the lesser of two evils, but whose proceeding, will be forever infamous. It must be admitted, then, that the violent men who yesterday surrounded Mr. HEWITT in the House, and showed by their temper and their words how narrow is the line which separates them from rebellion, have somewhat the better of him as regards the consistency of their argument. He asserts that the eight members of the Commission are perjurers, and that their decisions are not entitled to respect. Nevertheless, he proposes to adhere to them. What more natural than that the embryo rebels whom he has schooled up to their present position should turn round upon him and ask, "Would you have us accept the result of perjury? Shall we be parties to the enforcement of a decision which you say is infamous and ought not to be respected?" Mr. HEWITT'S answer—"If you don't, we shall have anarchy"—true in the main as it undoubtedly is, only half meets the queries addressed to him. To inculcate moderation effectively, and to sustain the authority of law as against the extremists who would substitute for law their own fierce partisanship, he must bridle his tongue when the character and work of the Commission are under consideration. And as it is with him, so it is with Mr. BAYARD and Democratic Senators and Representatives who hold that the decision of the Commission must be sustained. Their exhortations would be infinitely more effective if strengthened by their own good example.

Leaving these considerations out of account, the dangers incident to the programme of those who would prevent a legal declaration of the result of the election are too manifest to be mistaken. It is clear, in the first place, that if the labors of the Commission be frustrated, all the irritation it was intended to subdue will recur with increased intensity; all the difficulties and perils it was intended to obviate will reappear in an aggravated form. The second phase of the controversy will be worse than the first, because the contest, which originally involved honest differences of opinion, will be between the upholders and the enemies of law. The same desperation of purpose which prompts the advocates of delay to obtrude their policy whenever an opportunity occurs, will impel them to resist any settlement not in accordance with their wishes. Their quarrel with the Commission, divested of surplusage, is on the ground that it gives the Presidency to the Republican candidate. They are resolved that their party shall have the prize. These feelings will animate them as fully as now in the event of other measures being made necessary by the failure to finish the count. If, as some suggest, the Senate and its presiding officer at the last moment take up the unfinished work, go through the remaining returns, and declare Mr. HAYES elected, the country would unquestionably be content. The emergency would more than justify any technical irregularity. And as the proceeding, if it take place at all, will barely end before the present House passes out of existence, there can be no trouble direct from that source. Then comes the beginning of the anarchy which Mr. HEWITT foresees. The revolutionary element will be let loose and the Government will again be required to maintain its supremacy by force. The certainty as to the result of any such conflict does not excuse the madness or mitigate the guilt of those who would provoke it.

Take another hypothesis which is much talked of, and the prospect is not better. Assume that Mr. FERRY, or some sterling Republican who may be chosen in his place, steps from the chair of the Senate to the White House, and that next November another election for President shall be held, who can estimate the risks and difficulties incident to such a struggle? Our belief is that if Democratic factiousness render another election necessary, the Democratic Party will be crushed by the weight of the nation's indignation. Pending the election, the excitement will be intense. We shall have eight months or more during which an industrial and business revival will be impossible; all that remains of confidence will be destroyed; the country will be torn with partisan strife—with results which no thoughtful man can contemplate without apprehension. Besides, there can be no guarantee of Democratic acquiescence even then. A party which proposes to bring the machinery of Government to a stand-still by way of avenging defeat at the polls cannot be relied upon to accept quietly another verdict, if it also be adverse.

LIFE INSURANCE EXPENSES.

The Senate Insurance Committee, to whom the task of preparing a comprehensive bill in reference to life insurance has been intrusted, can scarcely overlook the moral of the returns supplied in response to Mr. BIXBY'S resolution. The absence of certain returns is not less suggestive than the returns that have been rendered. It is plain that companies which deservedly stand high in public estimation are unwilling to supply more minute information respecting their expenses than is exacted from them by the law. A resolution of the Legislature has no more binding force than an ordinarily formal request, and the Insurance Department has not been accustomed to add to such a resolution the specific inquiries which are required to bring out the facts desired. The natural results we have, first, in the inattention exhibited by certain institutions to the resolution even in the vague form conceived by Mr. BIXBY, and, second, in the keeping back by other companies of the details which are essential to a correct understanding of their miscellaneous expenditures. Nothing less than an imperative requirement of law will provide against the former of these contingencies. The other calls for much more discrimination in judging of the relative importance of facts than is apparent in the terms of Mr. BIXBY'S resolution or in the routine labors of the department. A statement of the salaries is well enough as far as it goes, but it covers only a small part of that lavish cost of management which is one of the scandals of the life insurance business.

As it is desirable in a discussion of this nature to consider facts as indications of the working of a system, rather than as evidences of individual mismanagement, we shall abstain from mentioning the companies whose returns seem to challenge momentary attention. As, moreover, we are still without the fuller exhibits of the companies' business in 1876, we must, for the purposes of illustration, measure the reported payments for salaries in that year by the reported business of the previous year. There is probably no injustice in this use of the records, since the general results last year are known to have been worse than those of the year which preceded it. Accepting, then, the epitome of the returns now published, we have in the case of one of the smaller companies an aggregate of salaries amounting to $116,428. In 1875 the same salaries are set down at $60,994. How shall this doubling, almost, of salaries in a period of extreme depression be accounted for? Is the explanation to be found in the phrase, "and other compensation," which appears in the published statement for 1875? Some explanation of this sort there must be, or a scale of payment which gives to the Vice President more than double the salary of the President, and which also rates the Secretary and Actuary at fifty per cent. in excess of the pay drawn by the President, is unintelligible. If there are percentages or fees in addition to the salary, the fact should be set forth, for it is one of the most demoralizing in the whole system.

The mystification produced by the returns as now furnished is not lessened by the statement of another company. The expenses of "running the company" last year are set down at $181,693. What is meant by the expression? The office salaries cannot form this amount, for in 1875 they aggregated only $37,311. On the other hand, three salaries alone now absorb $28,500. But "running the company" obviously implies the working of its complete machinery—agencies, medical fees, salaries and all. Now, in 1875, these formed a total, in round figures, of $210,000, to which, perhaps, ought to be added another round hundred thousand to complete the record of miscellaneous expenses. If the total miscellaneous expenses really have been cut down from $309,445 to $181,693, the statement as presented does injustice to the company. If, again, the latter figures are retained as the cost of working the company, when, in truth, various important items are excluded, the statement is unjust to the public.

Another of the published returns opens the whole subject of irregular forms of compensation, which the inquiry directed by the Senate failed to touch. The object of the inquiry was to bring into the light the various expenditures which make up the cost of conducting the business. Its inadequacy, already partially proved, is rendered more conspicuous by the particulars furnished by the company under notice. Fees and donations are reported in connection with salaries, the President, Vice President, Secretary, and Actuary receiving considerable amounts in addition to what appear to be adequate salaries. The practice is common, we know, but it is indefensible in any circumstances, and it opens the door to flagrant abuses. The money disbursed as "fees and donations" belongs to the policy-holders. It cannot belong to the stockholders, for we find that in 1875 the holders of the capital stock, which is returned at $100,000, actually received $55,000 in dividends. Fifty-five per cent. for money which to the policy-holders or the public is of no use whatever! During the same year we find that, exclusive of minor items, the payments to officers, medical examiners, and agents amounted to nearly $220,000, of which almost $140,000 was paid to agents alone. Are we to infer that the $83,040, which are now given as "the total amount paid out to officers and agents," represent only part of the gross expenditure, and need for their elucidation particulars which are not supplied?

The subject is not easily exhausted. It has so many ramifications that the Senate committee will have scope for their ingenuity in any provision they make for eliciting from the companies the details which, in a wholesome state of things, they would voluntarily exhibit. Taking the returns now obtained precisely as they stand, their worthlessness is manifest, so far as good management is concerned. The bona fide salaries of responsible officials are a comparatively small matter. The percentages or gifts, in addition to salaries, are morally bad and need thorough exposure. The sums paid to agents are so generally stated that it is impossible to ascertain the cost at which new business is acquired and the old business is carried on—a difference which ought to be visible on the surface, but one which the companies conveniently ignore. Then there are the miscellaneous disbursements, all entering into the question of management, but so indefinitely stated that no positive judgment can be formed as to their economy or extravagance. For these and similar particulars the committee must make stringent provision if their bill is to have any value as an aid to life insurance reform.

WHO DID IT?

The Democrats are trying to find out which of them is responsible for their defeat. They were defeated last November. Only just now have they waked up to the fact that they are really dead. There was once a story about an aged political Judge, who not only lived longer than he had any right to live, but who persisted in holding office and giving decisions long after his reputation was as dead as a door-nail. It was said of him that he had died but had not tumbled down. The Democratic party died last November, but it has persisted in walking about and making a noise ever since. It refused to go into its grave and be decently buried. It impertinently persisted in keeping above ground, revisiting the glimpses of the moon, like an unmannerly and wholly unreasonable spook. At last, however, the unwholesome carcase has begun to drop to pieces, and the members are quarreling about the responsibility for the catastrophe.

Such a lively corpse was never seen before. Let us admit that without a word of dispute. When the returns came in, the party insisted that these meant nothing. They swore that their candidate was elected, with or without returns. They refused to be dead. There were figures, facts, and opinions against them, to be sure. But they would not admit that these were conclusive. They circulated figures from the Bureau of Nincompoops, though they knew these to be fraudulent. They spoke of Mr. TILDEN as "the President-elect," and when all these failed them, they flew to last year's World Almanac, and imbibed consolation from a theory of averages, which elected their candidate in defiance of facts. Let us give all credit to the coon which did not come down, although it was as dead as the prehistoric man. The tail of the creature still clung to the tree, and refused to give up the ghost, though every other support had been taken away, and every other member had been struck dead by the remorseless hand of fate.

Mr. DAVID DUDLEY FIELD still fights on like the head of the snapping-turtle, which snaps viciously long after it has been kicked away from the dismembered body. We may not admire the discretion, but such a calm ignorance of death is worthy of attention. The bulk of the party, however, like EDGAR A. POE'S mesmerized corpse, suddenly and positively advertises its being moribund. It is edifying to see that the instinct of the small mischief-makers is to turn upon and rend each other. There were two kinds of Democrats in the late disastrous campaign—Democrats and Tilden Democrats. Perhaps we should say that there were two parties opposed to the Republicans, Democrats, and Tilden men. The first of these represented an organization. The second were the personal following of a nominee. It is impossible not to see that a man like WATTERSON, for example, light headed and incoherent though he is, adhered to the old-fashioned notion of "principles, not men." He and others like him believed that the St. Louis candidate was merely the incarnation of the Democratic Party. They maintained that delusion with loyal steadfastness. But there was another faction, more active, and therefore more mischievous. To this band of believers the party was for the time the personal property, the "usufruct," of the candidate. The National Committee was managed by this latter faction. No dog might bark in the party, from Maine to the Gulf, without permission of the committee. PELTON, the nephew of his uncle, was the soul of that central organization. Continually at loggerheads though he was with HEWITT, he ran the campaign, and when it was over and the Liberty-street Bureau was closed, he had the wires put in through his uncle's parlor-window, and essayed to conduct the resurrectionary proceedings from No. 15 Gramercy Park.

Naturally enough, HEWITT did not like this. His was the attitude of the rider in the celebrated two-horse act. He desired to be a Democrat and a Tildenite. This was difficult. He continually quarreled with PELTON, who represented the man, TILDEN; and he dissatisfied the old party managers, who felt their party interests were at stake. Consequently, his feeble intellect gave way. According to WATTERSON, who is an ideal Democrat, HEWITT, the nominal official head of the party, appeared in Congress "befuddled with self-mystification and vanity." Moreover, according to the same authority, he was "flighty and incapable." Nevertheless, it should not be forgotten that he was the Chairman of the National Democratic Committee, and that he was put into that position by desire of Mr. TILDEN. It is possible that the indignant Kentucky Democrat considers all this when he refers to HEWITT as "a bobolink, scudding, cloud-like, between the White House and the office of the Associated Press." PELTON has done the mischief, and poor HEWITT is "catching it" from the outraged and indignant Democracy.

The Democratic newspapers are prepared to go further than this. One of the Washington organs, in a moment of remorse, tells naughty stories about TILDEN'S conduct of the campaign. It says that a political intriguer of the old régime (GWIN?) headed the Tilden clique at Washington a year ago; that the primaries were "cooked" in the States; and that St. Louis, being selected as the place for holding the convention, was "salted" by an overpowering lobby. And the campaign by which the nomination was secured for TILDEN was "a lavish expenditure of money and a low intrigue." Furthermore, it is admitted that TILDEN and his friends promised to spend millions of money to elect him, but (and hence these tears) he only half fulfilled his promise of unlimited expenditure. Of course, all this is a tardy protest against Tildenism. And when the newspaper organ denounces PELTON'S Oregon intrigue as "the acme of political rascality," we may well understand that the organ grinder believes that "the jig is up," and that the time to tell the truth has come.

It is not necessary to refer to the squabble going on inside the Democratic party in Congress. We need not point to the Democratic candidate for Vice President protesting that the decision of the Electoral Commission be peacefully accepted, while the bitter old man in Gramercy Park pulls his blanket over his head and makes no sign. There are enough evidences of internal commotion without calling atttention to the confusion in Democratic counsels which splits the party so violently that even the caucus, that time-honored Democratic instrument of discipline, is despised and flouted. For the time being, the leaders have quit throwing hard names at Republicans. They have ceased attributing their defeat to fraud. They realize how dead they are, and they are charging their taking off to each other. Like the fallen spirits in the pit, they reproach one another. At last, every man is telling the truth. There are those who call HEWITT a bobolink, incapable and flighty, and others who consider PELTON a shallow intriguer, and even others who stigmatize TILDEN as merely "a rich, supple, and adroit New-York lawyer." In these we see some of the causes of defeat. But, after all, the Democracy was defeated—because it was the Democracy.

A NEW PASSPORT TO HEAVEN.

On Sunday last Rev. Mr. TALMAGE presented the life insurance cause to his hearers with his usual bold and reckless agility. Clergymen of the staid, old-fashioned type are accustomed to waste their time and energies in periodical praise of such unremunerative enterprises as missionary and Bible societies, although it is notorious that such societies allow no commission whatever to volunteer clerical agents. Of course, a shrewd and enterprising preacher like Mr. TALMAGE could not be expected to adhere to old-fashioned clerical customs. Instead of preaching in behalf of the missionary society, he preaches in favor of life insurance companies, which notoriously pay large commissions to agents of only moderate impudence. What value they set upon Mr. TALMAGE'S services can only be conjectured, but if they do not pay him at least fifty per cent. of all the premiums which he can secure among his congregation, they will show a gross inability to estimate the impudence of the agent who touts for them in the pulpit.

Lithe and agile as are the legs of Mr. TALMAGE, his warmest admirer must concede that they are not successful in drawing comparisons. While in many respects they are the peers of the best circus and ballet legs, they cannot trace an analogy correctly. This, however, is not strange; we must not require perfection of anything human. When Mr. TALMAGE throws one leg over the pulpit we readily concede its brilliancy and grace, and when he waves both legs in the air, we are melted by their irresistible pathos. A pair of legs characterized by brilliancy, wit, pathos, and eloquence should not be aspersed because they are lacking in some one other quality. Were TALMAGE absolutely perfect in all respects, he would be a cherub with legs—a variety of cherub totally unknown to theologians or painters.

When Mr. TALMAGE called JOSEPH "the President of the first life insurance company the world ever saw," he failed to perceive the true nature of JOSEPH'S corn operation. It is, perhaps, requiring too much to ask that every Brooklyn minister should thoroughly appreciate JOSEPH'S character, but there is really no excuse for misunderstanding his course in buying corn when the market was overstocked. That able Hebrew was the first financier on record who ever made a "corner." He bought enormous quantities of corn, which he held "for a rise," and when the years of famine arrived he was the only man in Egypt who had corn to sell. This operation presents itself to Mr. TALMAGE'S legs as precisely analogous to the ordinary business of a life insurance company. But let us be patient. Perhaps Mr. TALMAGE did not charge JOSEPH with being connected with life insurance companies out of personal malice. He may simply have desired to propitiate a Brooklyn audience by attacking the virtuous patriarch, and may have excused himself by reflecting that JOSEPH is dead to such an immense extent that he cannot be injured now by any libelous charge.

Mr. TALMAGE is so earnest in the matter that he thinks no man has a right to go to heaven who does not hold a policy of life insurance. To the scriptural command to the sinner to repent and be baptized Mr. TALMAGE adds, and insure your life in some good company. This is a rather startling addition to the Christian faith, but it is not much more startling than Mr. TALMAGE'S assertion that very bad and mean men go to heaven. He claims that it is "a mean thing" for a man who has neglected insuring his life, and is thus "worse than an infidel," to "go up to heaven while his family goes to the poor-house." There is no doubt that when Mr. TALMAGE roaches heaven, he will promptly expose the meanness of the men who have sneaked in without exhibiting certified copies of life insurance policies. Meanwhile, it will be news to most theologians to learn that mean men are ever admitted to heaven. This doctrine is, of course, full of comfort to Mr. TALMAGE, but it is certainly contrary to the orthodox creed. If heaven is to be full of mean men and Mr. TALMAGE'S legs, how can a conscientious clergyman picture it as a place of perfect bliss?

As has been said, there is no doubt that the life insurance companies ought to be grateful to Mr. TALMAGE. What other life insurance agent has ever announced from the pulpit that the man who does not insure his life, and thereby provide for the support of his wife's second husband, is worse than an infidel? What other preacher has ever asserted that a man who will go to heaven without leaving an insurance policy behind him is a mean fellow? Mr. TALMAGE'S commissions should be paid promptly, if these companies have a spark of gratitude about them; and the holders of Pacific Mail stock should at once employ Mr. TALMAGE to preach a sermon to steamship owners, and to incidentally show that no man can hope for salvation who is not willing to purchase at least ten shares of that stock at its nominal par value.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE NEW CAPITOL AGAIN.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The State Legislature is soon to decide whether the Albany Capitol shall be finished in the Renaissance style in which it was commenced, or whether the two stories yet to be added shall be in the Romanesque style. Your Albany correspondent of the 26th says that the majority of the members of the Legislature want to do justice in the matter, and then proceeds to give a sketch of the different styles, summing up as follows:

5. That the Romanesque forms, being a connecting-link between Roman and Gothic architecture, may be so designed as to harmonize with either of these styles.

The only point of resemblance between Romanesque and Roman is that both employ the round arch. The Gothic is the offspring of the Romanesque, the Renaissance of the Roman. The Romanesque succeeded the Roman, and there are Romanesque buildings in which Roman ornament can be found, like San Miniato at Florence. The new design for the Capitol, however, is in the later Romanesque, where it is being merged into the Gothic. There is no difficulty in finding buildings where styles have been mixed, but their condemnation as monuments of bad taste is almost the only point on which all art critics have agreed. Your correspondent says that if all the ornament on the two completed stories of the Capitol should be rubbed out there would remain a good ground-work for the new style. The if forms an important part of this statement, for it is not proposed, neither is it possible, to efface the solid granite ornament in the Renaissance style.

The new design is to be surmounted with a dome. The interior of a dome is one of the most beautiful of architectural forms. Its swelling lines give an idea of grandeur and strength combined with grace and lightness, which can be obtained in no other way. The proposed dome at Albany is a huge and expensive case for four stone staircases, which lead only to the cupola. These four staircases spring from a gallery around the base of the dome, and meet together in the centre at a point about two-thirds its height. Here they form a platform, from which rises a spiral staircase extending up into the cupola. Instead of looking upward into a vast open space, as at St. Peter's, St. Paul's, or at Washington, the spectator at Albany will see above him nothing but a confused and dizzy-looking maze of staircases.

It may reasonably be asked why do the new architects desire to substitute one style of architecture for another? Why cannot they make any improvement they may deem wise in the arrangement of the building, but follow out the style in which the building was commenced? The answer to this is that just now a sort of Gothic fever is prevalent among some American architects. They can see no taste in what Michael Angelo, Raphael, or Christopher Wren deemed beautiful. They cannot admire Nuremberg, unless they think Paris hideous. Once a similar fever prevailed in Italy. Then it took the form of a dislike to Gothic architecture. A celebrated architect put Renaissance doors and windows on the glorious Gothic cathedral at Milan, but he did not do either himself or his city much credit, neither will adding Romanesque to Renaissance at Albany do much credit to any concerned in the change. Those who think that the difference between any two styles is so slight that they can be mixed without violating the rules of art, will be likely to think differently when it is too late.

R. T. AUCHMUTY.

GEN. AGUILERA LYING IN STATE.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I very strongly sympathize with the protracted struggle in Cuba for the independence of the people, and whether the final result will be the establishment of a petty republic, the constitutional independence of the island under the monarchical suzerainty of the King of Spain, or the annexation of the island to the United States, it matters little so long as the revolutionists succeed in driving from the island the hordes of official swindlers who rob and oppress the people. I do not think it is wise policy, however, for the City authorities to identify the Municipal Government of this great community with the revolutionary movement. The gallant General whose body lies in semi-state in the Council Chambers was deserving of all sympathy, and any spontaneous act of public respect which the citizens might offer could not but be regarded with favor. To hoist alongside the national flag the flag of the Revolutionist party was a gratuitous insult to Spain, a country with which our Government has just concluded an international treaty of great importance, and whose pronounced friendly conduct on a recent memorable occasion surely deserved some consideration. What occasion would America have had to complain had, in the event of his death in London during his "diplomatic" mission to London, the Municipal Government of London allowed the body of Shdell to lie in state in St. Paul's Cathedral, and hoisted on the dome of that great edifice the Confederate flag alongside the Union Jack? The impertinent action of our City authorities is calculated to do mischief, while it cannot serve the noble cause for which the patriots are fighting in Cuba.

EX-JOURNALIST

BURIAL OF GEN. DENISON.

THE REMAINS OF THE LATE POSTMASTER OF BALTIMORE INTERRED IN GREENMOUNT CEMETERY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 26.—The remains of Gen. Andrew W. Denison, who died in this city on Saturday morning last, were to-day interred in Greenmount Cemetery. In respect to his memory, his associates in arms, and the citizens of Baltimore generally, have united in testifying to the high appreciation of his character by participating in the arrangements and the obsequies. During yesterday hundreds called at his late residence and viewed the remains of him who, by his kindly treatment to humanity, had endeared himself to thousands. The procession left the house at 3:30 o'clock P. M. in the following order: Sixth Regiment M. N. G., Col. Peters; Battery of artillery from Fort McHenry, under command of Major Ramsey; Fifth Regiment, M. N. G., Col. Loney; Baltimore City Guard Association, D. E. Woodburn President; Grand Army of the Republic, comprising delegations from Wilson Post No. 1, Dushane Post No. 3, and Lincoln Post No. 7, Gen. E. B. Tyler commanding; disabled soldiers in carriages; hearse with the remains, followed by a riderless horse, with military trappings, and led by a groom. The hearse was escorted on either side by the following named gentlemen, who acted as guard of honor and pall-bearers: Gen's. John R. Kenley, Charles E. Phelps, Felix Agnus, Adam E. King; Cols. E. H. Webster, E. F. M. Fachtz, Edward Wilkins, and J. G. Johannes; Major H. L. Taggart, Capt. W. E. Andrews, Capt. Louis A. Carl, Major L. A. Cassard, Capt. J. T. Armacost, Sergt. Charles Snyder, Lieut. John N. Richardson, and Mr. John Dietrich. Then followed the relatives and friends of the deceased in carriages, immediately in the rear of which were the employes of the Post Office and citizens. As the cortège passed through the city the bands played funeral dirges. For miles along the route thousands of persons filled the sidewalks and windows of the buildings adjacent. The city bells tolled mournfully, and flags were trimmed with crape and displayed at half mast in all points of the city. At dusk the procession arrived at Greenmount, and the body was soon lowered to its last resting place.

HEALTH OFFICER OF BALTIMORE.

DR. JAMES A. STEWART APPOINTED TO THE OFFICE — THE REWARD FOR HAVING PROTECTED THE CITY AGAINST YELLOW FEVER.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 26.—Dr. James A. Stewart was to-day appointed Health Commissioner of this city. He is the personage who scattered denials far and wide contradicting the report that the yellow fever prevailed to an alarming extent last September in the eastern part of the city. It was then, and is now, asserted by physicians of the best repute that the disease which Dr. Stewart designated as type-malaria was a malignant form of yellow fever, as asserted by the New-York press. The name of Dr. Stewart was sent to the City Council by Mayor Latrobe one week ago, but he was refused the appointment, which he obtains to-day. He assisted the Democratic authorities to contradict the report that the fever did not prevail here, even though it might have been at the sacrifice of many lives. The Democratic authorities now assist him to a remunerative office at the sacrifice of truth.

LEGISLATION IN NEW-JERSEY.

PARTY FEELING UNDER RESTRAINT—BILLS INTRODUCED IN BOTH HOUSES—THE ARREARAGES TO EMPLOYES OF THE CENTRAL.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

TRENTON, Feb. 26.—The House proceedings opened this evening with a resolution declaring that—

Whereas, The interest and welfare of the people demand a speedy termination of the Electoral count, the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Jersey be and they are requested to oppose all dilatory motions calculated to prevent a prompt settlement of the Presidential question, to the end that the President elect, Hon. Rutherford B. Hayes, be promptly inaugurated, and a permanent peace—

Mr. Egan moved that the resolution lay on the table. It was adopted with but two or three dissenting votes. In a house in which the parties are evenly divided the policy of the introduction of such resolutions as this is questionable, and the fact that they are always promptly laid on the table by non-partisan votes is ascribable to the fact that none of the members wish to impede legislation by stirring up bad blood.

Mr. Tilden introduced a bill abolishing the Director at Large of the Board of Freeholders of Hudson County; Mr. Paxton, one designed to enable the North Hudson County Township to draw a water supply from Jersey City; Mr. Van Rensselaer, one providing that any person found in possession of murderous weapons, or burglars' tools, or bottles which either contain, or may have contained, chloroform, or other anæsthetics, shall be subject, on conviction, to imprisonment for one to ten years; also another, by Mr. Van Rensselaer, creating a Board of Representative Trustees of Rutgers' College, consisting of six Alumni.

In the Senate, President Abbett introduced a bill authorizing the Chancellor to order the immediate payment of arrearages due to the Central New-Jersey Railroad employes, amounting to $400,000, and relieving companies which have been or may hereafter be operated by Receivers for four months from a law exacting forfeiture of their respective charters. Mr. Leaming introduced a bill requiring the Clerk of the supreme Court to pay his receipts quarterly to the State Controller, and fixing his salary, in lieu of all other emoluments, at $10,000, and his expenses to the same amount.

The Democrats held a joint caucus to prepare for to-morrow's joint meeting. James N. Davis was nominated Police Justice of Jersey City. The nominations for Newark local officers are to be handed up in the morning.

THE WOMEN'S CENTENNIAL FUND.

THE NEW-YORK UNION HAS $1,500—IT IS TO FORM A BASIS FUND WITH WHICH TO AID YOUNG WOMEN IN THE STUDY OF ART.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The Executive Committee of the Women's Centennial Union of New-York beg to make the following statement as a supplement to the report of May 8, and for the benefit of all interested: That upon the closing up of the business of returning exhibits, &c., the sum of $1,890 was the balance in the Treasury; that of this $300 were voted toward a testimonial to Mrs. E. D. Gillespie, President of the Women's Pavilion, Philadelphia, in response to a request from the Philadelphia Committee. Further, that in the following resolution the remaining $1,500 were devoted to a "Woman's Centennial Union Fund," as originally proposed:

Resolved, By the Executive Committee of the Women's Centennial Union of New-York, that the sum of $1,500 be handed by the Treasurer to the Trustees of the Cooper Institute, in the City of New-York, on condition that this sum shall form the nucleus of a permanent fund, to be invested by them for the aid and partial support of such deserving young women as may require assistance while pursuing their studies in any branch of the Art School. That this fund, while capable of being increased by donations and legacies, shall receive and always retain the name of "The Woman's Centennial Union Fund of New-York;" and that the interest only of this fund shall be appropriated by the Trustees at their discretion for the assistance of individual students.

Resolved, That the Trustees return their thanks to the Executive Committee of the Women's Centennial Union of New-York for their very kind donation to establish a benefaction fund in the Art School of the Cooper Union. PETER COOPER, President.
EDWARD COOPER, Secretary pro tem.

The banner, now in safe keeping in Philadelphia is eventually to be placed in the proposed Woman's Memorial Hall in that city.

The Book of Record of the Women's Centennial Union of New-York, containing the names of those who contributed to the banner, and the Report of the Women's Centennial Union, has been kindly accepted for preservation among its archives by the Historical Society of New-York.

For the Executive Committee, by the Secretary of the Women's Centennial Union of New-York.

*THE SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA

WASHINGTON.

THE WORK OF CABINET MAKING.

EFFORTS OF AMBITIOUS PERSONS AND SECTIONAL CLIQUES TO FILL PRESIDENT HAYES' CABINET—SUPERELUOUS PATRIOTISM.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—The attempts that are making on behalf of a score or two of applicants for appointments in Gov. Hayes' Cabinet are exciting a good deal of unfavorable comment, and criticism on such efforts is increasing. Every day or two some new applicant is heard of, whose friends have signed requests or letters of petition to Mr. Hayes, or have sent delegates to Columbus, or have taken some other unusual method to get their candidate's claims considered. Not one of these movements that has come to light is spontaneous with any large number of persons who seek to secure the appointment of good men to the Administration, but in every instance they have originated with the candidates themselves, or with some particular politicaling or sectional clique. There are seven Cabinet positions which ought to be filled by men, any one of whom is fit to be President. Unfortunately the emoluments and power of the offices are not such as usually tempt such men either to seek or accept them. These appointments are the most purely personal affairs of the President, and should not be meddled with by thrusting upon him either petitions or advice which is not sought. It ought to be considered as conclusive evidence of the man's unfitness for a Cabinet position that he would himself, or through his friends, permit a request for a position to be made in his behalf. The Cabinet should be made up by men who hold themselves above seeking any public office. Gov. Hayes will, doubtless, seek the most complete information, where his own knowledge of men is not sufficient to guide his judgment, and select a Cabinet with a view to make strong and honest and independent the Administration which it becomes his duty to organize for the next four years.

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—The Senate in executive session to-day confirmed the following nominations: Frank W. Palmer, to be Postmaster at Chicago, vice John McArthur; whose commission expired Dec, 20, 1876. Charles Morgan, Postmaster at Glen's Falls, New-York; William P. Dewey, Surveyor-General for Dakota; Pay Director, James H. Watmough, to be Chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, Navy Department, vice Pay Director Bradford, retired; Chief Engineer William H. Shock, to be Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, vice William W. W. Wood, Engineer in Chief, resigned.

The bill introduced by Representative Bliss, of New-York, known as the Wallabout Market bill, which passed the Senate last week, has received the signature of the President, and became a law to-day. The President has also approved the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill.

A circular letter has been sent to Collectors of Ports by the Treasury Department, announcing that it is understood from the public prints that the rinderpest has again broken out in England, and consequently importations of neat cattle and hides of neat cattle, coming from that country, are prohibited until further orders.

Paymaster Henry T. Skedlin has been ordered to the receiving ship Wyoming, at the Navy-yard, Washington; Chaplain Richard Hayward to the receiving ship Colorado, at New-York, March 1; Chaplain Henry R. Nibbon has been detached from the receiving ship Colorado, on the 28th inst., and placed on waiting orders.

A dispatch received in this city from London, dated Feb. 17, says the Treasury Committee of the British Parliament has submitted a report on meteorological observations in which it suggests the adoption of the American meteorological system. The report sets forth the perfection of the Weather Bureau in the United States, and admits that we are ahead of all the rest of the world in the accuracy of our forecasts.

Secretary Robeson, in a letter to Senator Windom, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, on the effects of the contemplated reduction of the appropriation for the pay of United States Naval officers and seamen, concludes as follows: "It is proper that I should also remind you that a larger number of our officers and men are now serving abroad on distant stations, in accordance with the policy of our Government, and the purposes for which navies are established and maintained, and that unless a sufficient sum is appropriated for their pay, they will not only be left without their daily support in foreign parts, but the department will have no means of preserving the credit of the Government by payments of the drafts drawn to meet their expenses, and that if Congress should fail to make an adequate appropriation for this purpose, it would be the obvious duty of the Secretary of the Navy, whoever he may then be, to bring over ships on foreign stations home at once."

The probability is that Rear Admiral John Rodgers, now in command of the Mare Island, Cal., Navy-yard, will be ordered to command of the Naval Observatory in this City in the place of Rear Admiral Davis, deceased.

Hon. D. W. Voorhees has addressed the following letter to Gen. C. D. MacDougall, dated Feb. 24, in which he says:

"My attention has been called to the report that some days ago I had a prolonged interview with Senator Conkling in regard to the present Presidential complications. Nothing could possibly be further from the truth. I had occasion to see Mr. Conkling on a matter of business, and I called on him in his committee-room for that purpose. I found him suffering from severe indisposition, and our interview did not last more than five minutes. Not one word was spoken on the subject of the Presidency, and the remotest allusion made to political affairs. I deem it due to the distinguished Senator, as well as to myself, to make this statement.

John S. Miller has been appointed Revenue Storekeeper and Gauger for the Eighth District of Pennsylvania, and R. D. Craig for the Seventh District of Kentucky; John W. Payne, Gauger for the First District of Indiana, and John D. Roberts for the Fifth District of Illinois.

The following were the balances in the Treasury at the close of business to-day: Currency, $9,182,422; special deposit of legal tenders for the redemption of certificates of deposit, $36,120,000; coin, including $52,738,400 in coin certificates, $85,101,768; outstanding legal tenders, $364,984,812.

IMPORTANT TO DISTILLERS.

METHOD OF DETERMINING WHETHER MATERIAL HAS BEEN USED IN EXCESS OF CAPACITY—A CIRCULAR FROM THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has sent the following circular to Collectors concerning the method of determining whether material has been used by a distiller in excess of capacity:

It is made the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by the Revised Statutes, section 3,309, upon the receipt of the return of the distiller in each month, to proceed to inquire and determine whether the distiller has accounted for all the grain or molasses used, and all spirits produced by him in the preceding month, and also whether he has used any grain or molasses in excess of the capacity of his distillery as estimated according to law. Special No. 165, bearing date Sept. 6, 1875, proceeds upon the idea that a proper construction of the word "used," in respect to grain or molasses mashed, is that such grain or molasses is used when alcoholic spirits, having been properly developed, are separated therefrom by distillation, and, to enforce this construction, declares that in making this inquiry and determination the quantity of material used each month would be ascertained by adding the quantity of material on hand in mash or beer at the beginning of the month to the quantity put in mash during the month, and deducting from the total the quantity on hand in mash or beer at the end of the month, the remainder being the quantity used during the month.

Under this rule, which is still in force, the material distilled during the month being the sum of the various quantities distilled on the several working days of the month, is held to be the quantity of material used during the month. The total capacity of the distillery for the month, (expressed in bushels of grain or gallons of molasses, as the case may be,) is the sum of the different daily capacities of the distillery for the several working days of the month. The inquiry and determination as to the excessive use of material which the Commissioner is required by law to make is not a matter of discretion, but rests solely in computation, and consists in an arithmetical comparison of the quantity of material so found to have been used with the total capacity of the distillery for the month in question.

It will be observed that if the capacity of the distillery on each working day has been exactly equal to the material used—that is, distilled on that day—then the total capacity will equal the total material used, and no excess of material will be found; but if the capacity has on any day or days been less than the quantity of material used—that is, distilled on such day or days—then, unless there has been a corresponding and equal overplus of capacity on some other day or days of the same month, the total capacity will not equal the material used, and an excessive use of material will be found, for which the statute requires an assessment to be made.

It will be further observed that when a distiller desires to reduce or suspend production, and commences mashing a smaller quantity of material daily, or ceases mashing altogether, he cannot safely diminish capacity by closing the unused fermenting tubs until the larger quantities of material previously mashed have been distilled, because, unless the aggregate capacity for the month equals the total material distilled during the month, an excess of material used must result, and be followed by an assessment equal to the tax on 80 per cent. of spirits that should be produced from the quantity of grain used in excess of the distillery for such month. By preserving the larger capacity the distiller will not unduly expose himself to a deficiency in the production of spirits, because the material distilled will be equal to the capacity maintained during the distillation, and if a deficiency occurs it will result from a failure to produce 80 per cent. of the amount of spirits required by the survey of such distillery to be produced from a bushel of grain or gallon of molasses.

When a change is made in the kind of material used, the change of capacity resulting therefrom will be deemed to take place on the day when the new material is distilled, so that the material and capacity may balance each other. A careful observance of the instructions and explanations contained herein will, it is believed, prevent distillers from incurring assessments for excessive use of material arising from any reasonable misapprehension as to what their duties and liabilities are, and to this end you are requested to place a copy of this letter in the hands of every Deputy Collector, store-keeper, "store-keeper and gauger," and grain or molasses distiller in your district, and for this purpose you will make immediate requisition for a sufficient number of copies, and distribute them at once upon receipt thereof.

WAS HE POISONED?

SUSPICIOUS DEATH OF A MEDICAL MAN IN A TENEMENT-HOUSE IN WEST TWENTY-EIGHTH STREET.

At a late hour last night a dispatch was received from the Twentieth Precinct at Police Headquarters stating that a Dr. Lynch, aged 40 years, no home, went to No. 228 West Twenty-eighth street yesterday with a man named Conklin who has furnished rooms in the house, and that after they entered Conklin's room the latter gave Lynch something to drink from a small bottle. A short while after Lynch fell dead to the floor. An investigation of the case revealed the following facts: The house in which the man died is a large tenement-house, the ground floor of which is occupied by Henry Shay, a man employed in the Madison-avenue Stables, who up to about six weeks ago rented a furnished room to the man Conklin. On Friday last the latter called at Shay's residence and introduced to Mrs. Shay Dr. John Lynch as an eligible family physician who would be glad to attend her during her approaching confinement. The two men after remaining a short while left, and returned again yesterday at 1 o'clock, when Dr. Lynch asked after Mrs. Shay's health. While speaking to the woman he was seized with a sudden illness, and Conklin requested permission to place the doctor on a bed in an adjoining room. Conklin then took from his coat pocket a small bottle which he placed to the lips of the doctor, who apparently drank a portion of its contents. Conklin returned the bottle to his pocket, and left the house, leaving the doctor lying on the bed. About 9 P. M., a Miss Briscoe, who usually occupies the room in which Lynch was lying, entered the apartment and discovered that he was dead. The Police were immediately notified, and a search was made for Conklin, but he was not found up to an early hour this morning. Coroner Ellinger was notified to investigate the cause of Lynch's death.

WASHINGTON'S RELATIVES IN NEED.

A PLAINTIVE LETTER FROM A THIRD COUSIN OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT—OLD AND POOR.

From the Petersburg (Va.) Index, Feb. 24.

A gentleman of this city recently received a letter from a lady in Russellville, Ky., written in response to inquiries relative to a family of Washingtons living in that State. In order to obtain the desired intelligence the lady wrote to Mr. Washington, making inquiries as to his condition and his relation to Gen. George Washington, and received a beautifully-written reply, which was inclosed to the gentleman above-mentioned. It has been placed at our disposal, and as a matter of interest we make the following extracts from it. Any assistance sent to this venerable and most deserving family would, no doubt, be highly appreciated and at the same time be very timely:

GORDONSVILLE, LOGAN COUNTY, KY., Feb. 7, 1877.

Miss ——: * * * The history of my life would be, indeed, a tale of woe. My father, a native of Virginia, came to this State in the year 1811 a wealthy man, but by a series of misfortunes, and misplaced confidence in men whom he regarded as his friends, was reduced from affluence to indigence, and my sisters and myself—now advanced in life—are dependent on the kindness of friends for the necessaries of life. The world could be spared to see the 8th of April next I shall enter the 78th year of my life. I have never at any time been very robust, and the infirmities of age now press hard upon me. Forty-four years of my life were spent in the school-room, but, in consequence of the almost total loss of my hearing, I was compelled to abandon an occupation from which I had during the time derived nearly the means of support, and was thus, in the decline of life, left destitute.

My father at his decease had nothing to leave to his family, but, owing to the kindness of some of our Virginia relatives, my sisters had in the Union Bank of Tennessee stock to the amount of $1,000, besides $500 loaned to one of our nephews, in the recent civil war they lost it all, and, as I said before, have lived ever since in a state of precarious dependence on their friends. A few years ago a lady of our acquaintance left my sisters and me a legacy of $1,000 in the South, but, owing to financial embarrassments there, we received only $400 of the amount, and that in small installments, with very long intervals between. The balance ($600) we shall never get. In consequence of this loss, my sisters and I were obliged to give up a little home which I had purchased with the expectation of paying for it out of this bequest, and we are now living on it by the permission of the present proprietor, of whom I purchased it, who took it back after I had paid $500.

This gentleman built for my sisters and myself a small room, to which, through the liberality of some good friends in Russellville, I was enabled to add a cook-room; and in this diminutive apartment we are now living, crowded with various utensils and articles of furniture for which we can find no other place. Our room is alternately a sitting, reception-room, drawing room and kitchen, and the floor is in continual vibration from passers to and fro.

My youngest sister is now 60 years of age. Although we have lost nearly everything that we once possessed, we are thankful for what yet remains. We have a house over our heads, and kind, sympathizing friends who would doubtless do much for us if they possessed the power.

You desire to learn something respecting my relationship to Gen. Washington. My grandfather, Warner Washington, of Virginia, and the General were brothers' children; consequently my father and Gen. Washington were second cousins, and I, of course, am third cousin to the General. We had several memorials of our illustrious kinsman which we would gladly have retained as heirlooms in the family, but our straitened circumstances compelled us to part with them.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,
WILLIAM A. WASHINGTON.

GENERAL TELEGRAPH NEWS

SEVERE GALE IN THE BERMUDAS.

THE ISLAND VISITED BY A TERRIBLE STORM—GREAT DAMAGE DONE TO PROPERTY—SEVERAL LIVES BELIEVED TO BE LOST.

BERMUDA, Feb. 21.—On the 10th inst., about midday, a very severe gale passed over these islands. Shortly after 12 o'clock the wind began to blow very fresh from the north. Suddenly, about 1 o'clock, it increased, and in a few minutes a tremendous gale was blowing, and continued to blow for about two hours. Notwithstanding the short duration of the storm, the record of damage done to life and property is a heavy one. The pilot gig Marcella, with her crew, was in all probability lost. The gig left Master's Bay, near the light-house, in pursuit of a vessel that was approaching the land from the south-west. At the beginning of the gale she was seen making her course all right, but after the weather had moderated the Marcella was nowhere to be seen. It is supposed that she was capsized at the very beginning of the gale, and perished with all hands on board. The following persons composed the crew: Alexander Brangman, Branch Pilot; Samuel Bassett, Clements Bassett, Charles Wilson, and Henry Douglass.

The damage to property is extensive. The roof was blown from the quarters of the officers of the Eighty-seventh Regiment. The encampments of the Royal Artillery, and Royal Engineers were leveled; some slate was torn from the residence of the Postmaster General. Several trees were uprooted, or denuded of their branches; the shipping in port was driven across to the St. David's island side of the harbor, garden produce was annihilated, and vegetation generally looked as if a heavy frost had rested upon it. In parishes to the west of the causeway trees were torn up, houses were unroofed, and in one case a new house was blown down, and produce was destroyed. Altogether the effects indicate a storm of great severity.

A FIGHT WITH INDIANS.

DEADWOOD, Feb. 26.—A courier who arrived from the military camp, 40 miles north of this city, to-day, reports that Lieut. Cummings, with Company C, Third Cavalry, attacked a small Indian camp on the 23d inst. The Indians fled through the ravines, leaving several ponies and all their property. Lieut. Cummings captured a large herd of sheep, a small number of cattle, 16 ponies, and Indian robes and blankets. After the soldiers had gone into camp at night, the Indians returned and made an attack which was promptly repulsed. One Indian was killed. None of the whites were injured. Indian signal fires are seen in all directions. The command is moving southward to day, to meet a supply of rations, which has been sent from here. The other two companies, ordered from Camp Robinson, have not yet arrived.

QUARANTINED FOR SMALL-POX.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—The following is an extract from a dispatch received at the Department of State from the United States Consulate at Sydney, New South Wales, dated Jan. 2: "The mail steam-ship Austra, from San Francisco, having lost a passenger by small-pox, will be placed in quarantine upon her arrival. A Government proclamation has been issued declaring San Francisco an infected port, from which all ships may be subject to quarantine. The disease had been previously introduced by a mail steamer from Singapore, and all vessels arriving from Eastern ports are embraced in the proclamation. One case only has occurred in this city, in an isolated position, which has been regularly quarantined, and it is hoped the disease will not spread."

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

BETHLEHEM, Feb. 26.—At 7 o'clock this morning a scaffolding in a blast furnace of the Bethlehem Iron Company's works on which seven men were at work, gave way, six of the men fell to the bottom, a distance of 70 feet, two of them, Charles Mayer, of Rittersville, Penn., and Henry Kichline, of Bethlehem, being instantly killed, and the other four seriously wounded. Four men had to hold him while his sentence was being read.

The ice is very thin and rotten. The ferry-boat Lark is now running.

To-day the bank officers instituted criminal proceedings against him, and bail was fixed at $15,000, which he was unable to secure. He was found hanging from the same rafter on which the Cashier preceding him, William M. Bertram, had hanged himself in 1865.

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

THE OPERA BOUFFE.

An opera bouffe new to American audiences, and entitled "La Boulangère a des Ecus" was made known at the Eagle Theatre, last evening. The score is from the pen of M. Offenbach, and MM. Meilhac and Halévy are the librettists. "La Boulangère" is hardly likely to hold a prominent place in the current repertoire. Its story consists merely of a succession of more or less animated and amusing episodes; its personages are of the conventional type, and the music, although vivacious, does not include a single number destined to become widely popular. Did space permit, therefore, we should not feel inclined to enter into the details of the plot, which turns upon the fondness of Margot and Toinon for Bernadille, whose amorous intrigues are interrupted by a political conspiracy of the familiar sort, and by sundry incidents of a comical nature, in which Police agents disport themselves. A complete enumeration of the tunes would be equally uninteresting, for only two or three merit notice. The finale of the first act is quite lively, and the duet commencing "Les farinieres," in the second act, is also to be cited as clever; the finale of this act, however, is the most effective piece in the whole opera, and the laughable scene upon which the curtain fell, with an army of bakers and bakeresses attacking, with long French loaves, a much dismayed Police magistrate, was loudly applauded. In the last two acts of "La Boulangère," the most notable incident was Mlle. Aimée's singing of "La Paloma," which she has often introduced, and never, we may add, at a point where it was more required. The song had to be repeated thrice. As Margot, Mlle. Aimée of course sang and acted charmingly, but the rôle is a thankless one, and the sooner she reappears in better-known characters the better. M. Raoult was quite equal to Bernadille, and MM. Duplan and Mezières diffused considerable fun as the Police agents. The other rôles were allotted to MM. Branciart and Benedick, and to Mme. Duparc. The new work has been put upon the stage with taste and liberality in respect of scenic attire, and the costumes are fresh and rich; the management has, therefore, done its whole duty in the matter of producing "La Boulangère" in a manner fitted to insure its favorable reception. The programme will remain unchanged throughout the week.

WALLACK'S THEATRE.

Goldsmith's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," was given last night, for the first time this season, at Wallack's Theatre. The attendance was large, and there was much laughter and frequent applause. Perhaps of all the old comedies, "She Stoops to Conquer" is the best known, and its popularity is plainly attested by the regularity with which it is performed at the principal play-houses. It has been brought out at Wallack's, at certain stages of each season, for as many years as we care to remember, and Mr. Wallack's Charles Marlow has thus become, for the public, one of his most familiar characters. It is therefore hardly necessary to say more than that the present revival is in all respects equal to previous representations of the piece. Mr. Wallack's acting is as pleasing as of old, and if no new points are made by the artist, there is at least no falling off in the qualities which heretofore have never failed to charm. The transitions from sheepish modesty to brazen impudence are accomplished with an art so thorough as to conceal its purpose, and, indeed, the nice shades of the character are all laid on by a master hand. The cast was in other respects very strong. Mr John Gilbert personated Mr. Hardcastle, while Mr. Harry Beckett was Tony Lumpkin, and Mr. C. S. Stevenson filled the the rôle of Hastings—and left much to be desired. Miss Ada Dyas earned a large share of the applause of the evening as Kate Hardcastle, and Miss Rose Wood and Mme. Ponisi completed the symmetry of the performance in the parts, respectively, of Constance Neville and Mrs. Hardcastle. The stage setting was tasteful, as it always is at this theatre. "She Stoops to Conquer" will be performed again on this and Saturday evenings; on Wednesday and Friday nights "Wild Oats" may be enjoyed.

BRIEF MENTION.

Mr. John T. Raymond was in town on Sunday.

Announcement is made that Mr. De Vivo has retired from the management of Miss Abbott's operatic and concert tour.

Miss Emma Abbott will sing in "La Figlia" at the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, to-morrow evening, and the same opera is to be repeated in this City, at the Academy, on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Ole Bull and Mme. Esipoff will unite in the concert to be given at Steinway Hall to-morrow evening. The well-known violinist has not been heard here for many months, and the announcement of his reentrée will, no doubt, be received with lively satisfaction.

"LE VOYAGE A LA LUNE."

A CARD FROM MESSRS. JARRETT & PALMER OF BOOTH'S THEATRE.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

You will discover underlined in our advertisement, to-day's TIMES for early production at this theatre, Jules Verne's and Offenbach's spectacular opera bouffe, "Le Voyage à la Lune," upon which has already been expended a great deal of money.

The Messrs. Kiralfy Brothers at one time proposed to bring the piece out at Niblo's Garden, but in an interview with us subsequently had, they apparently concluded to respect our earnest objection. During this friendly conference arrangements were made for the transfer of "Fifth Avenue" to their theatre in Philadelphia.

In all our commerce with the Messrs. Kiralfy we have found them fair dealers, and hence their erratic course in this particular case, indicated by their card in to-day's TIMES, has engendered our greatest surprise.

Our determination is to keep faith with the public, and upon this the Messrs. Kiralfy, and all in any way interested may be satisfied that the piece will be produced in Booth's Theatre and not at Niblo's Garden.

A play that has achieved so great a success in London as to go beyond its 250th representation we cannot afford to let slip from our hands, and the public would have a modified estimate of our enterprise were we to suffer any one to overreach us.

Respectfully, JARRETT & PALMER.

EXCITEMENT AT STAPLETON.

There was great excitement at Stapleton, Staten Island, last evening in consequence of a rumor that an attempt would be made to pull down the club-house belonging to the New-York Yacht Club. Fifty-seven special officers were sworn in by the Deputy Sheriff to protect the structure during the night. Capt. Chambers of the tug-boat Middletown, was arrested on a warrant issued by Police Justice Garret, for attempting to "butt down" the club-house with the bow of his boat yesterday.

An Honest Physician

solicitous for the welfare of his patrons, would have them obtain all the knowledge they can respecting their systems and the diseases to which they are incident, fully conscious how much easier his task of treating patients is when they are well informed in those matters pertaining to health and disease. Good nursing plays such an important part in effecting cures, and is so little understood by the masses, that hundreds of the best physicians have aided in the circulation of "THE PEOPLE'S MEDICAL ADVISER" to disseminate its admirable teachings on the care of the sick. Nor do sensible people appreciate this popular work less because its author does not advise every man to attempt, under all circumstances, to be his own physician. The sale, so soon after its first publication, of nearly one hundred thousand copies of this work, only serves to create increased demand for it, and never before has it sold so rapidly as of late. It has been enlarged to over nine hundred pages, illustrated by two hundred and eighty-two engravings and colored plates, elegantly bound in cloth and gilt, and will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of one dollar and fifty cents. Peruvian Syrup is a standard remedy for building up and renewing broken-down or nervous constitutions. For dyspepsia, debility, liver complaint, kidney and bladder diseases, or part of the many irregularities of the various organs of the human frame, it is a sovereign remedy. It is a tonic without alcohol. This medicine is too well known already to require any commendation from us. It is only necessary for us to say to those who have never given it a trial that it will accomplish all that is claimed for it. Now is the time to tone up the system before the hot months of Summer fairly set in. Sold by all druggists.

SAVING THE OLD EXCHANGE

ACTIVITY OF THE GOLD BOARD.

A TURBULENT MEETING OF THE MEMBERS—THEIR INDIGNATION AT THE ACTION OF THE STOCK BOARD—THE QUESTION OF SECURING NEW ROOMS DISCUSSED.

One of the largest meetings ever held in the Gold Exchange took place there yesterday afternoon. This was the result of the action taken by the Stock Exchange on Saturday evening and of circulars that had been lavishly distributed calling upon the members to "save the Old Exchange." Mr. C. O. Morris presided. He said that no answer had been received from the Stock Exchange to the communication sent them by the Gold Board, and stated the object of the meeting to be to consider a recommendation that the Executive Committee appoint a special committee to secure new rooms for the exchange after May 1. Mr. John F. Underhill started the ball by offering a resolution that the Executive Committee be instructed to lease without further delay a suite of rooms for the use of the Gold Exchange after May 1. A motion was instantly made to lay the resolution on the table amid great confusion, catcalls, and cries of all sorts. The yeas were called for, and a tremendous yell was the result. Then the nays shouted at the top of their lungs, and a division was demanded. The excitement at this time was awful. Every person present was on his feet, shouting and insisting on being recognized; the Chairman was rapping furiously with his gavel, and for a few minutes no business could be transacted. Mr. Underhill nearly succeeded in beginning a speech, but was promptly ruled out of order. Then a division was ordered, and 170 members held up their right hands in favor of tabling Mr. Underhill's resolution. This was followed by cheers for the "Old Exchange." The nays could only muster 60 votes. Order being partially restored, a motion was made and seconded for the appointment of a committee of five to meet the Governing Committee of the Stock Exchange and confer with them on the existing state of affairs. Before it could be put, however, an amendment was offered that the Governing Committee of the Stock Exchange be required to conform to the rules of common courtesy, and answer the communication of the Gold Exchange. The Chairman ruled both motions out of order. Mr. John T. Denny, who is a member of the Governing Committee of the Stock Exchange as well as of the Gold Exchange, arose and said that the neglect of the former body to reply to the latter was due to no lack of courtesy, but to the fact that the meeting had followed so closely upon the heels of Saturday's meeting that the Secretary of the Stock Exchange had not had time to prepare a reply. If given permission he would state just how matters stand. He was called to order on the ground that there was no subject before the meeting, but on motion unanimous consent was given him to proceed. Premising that he had no authority to appear on behalf of the Governing Committee, he said that the reason the Stock Exchange had leased the Gold Exchange building was because they wanted some place for transactions in Government, and in order to provide rooms for the Mining Board, which might be considered a ward of the Stock Exchange. Owing to the cordiality that had always existed between the two exchanges, the committee had at first been at a loss how to act. There had been a great deal of discussion and much difference of opinion. At length the committee decided to call in 12 members of the Gold Exchange and two members of the Board of Exchange, and who did not hold office in their own exchange. The new deliberations also developed much diversity of views. Some were in favor of leasing the building at once, and starting a mining board in it, while others were opposed to breaking up the gold business on such short notice. The conclusion which had been finally come to were reported correctly in Sunday's TIMES. Mr. Denny proceeded to read from THE TIMES, amid cries of "read it in German." This last was a palpable hit on the number of Germans present, and was greeted by a round of applause and laughter. In conclusion Mr. Denny stated that the effect of the changes in the by-laws was to prevent members of the Stock Exchange from dealing in gold in any other exchange. He was here interrupted by Mr. Underhill, who warmly denied the right of any body of men to vote away the property of others. Mr. Denny replied that he was not there to argue the question, but simply to state the facts. The Governing Committee of the Stock Exchange had always exercised the right to say where its members should deal and what securities they should deal in, and the members had agreed to abide by the decisions of the committee. Somebody took exception to this statement, and said the members had not agreed to anything of the kind. Mr. Denny retorted that the rule was that after decisions had been posted a week they became law unless overruled by a vote of two-thirds of the members.

Mr. Underhill was then given the floor. He said that it was evident that the meeting was a one-sided affair, and that no one not in the ring would be allowed an opportunity of expressing his opinion. The explanation of the fact was, that many members of the Gold Exchange had joined the movement to found an Exchange that may become a formidable opponent of the Stock Exchange. The Chairman called Mr. Underhill to order, on the ground that there was no subject before the meeting. The confusion here broke out afresh, and Bedlam reigned for a few moments. Then a resolution was passed to permit Mr. Underhill to continue his speech. Mounting a desk, he violently attacked the Stock Exchange. "If" he said, "the course of action of that body be permitted to triumph, the gold market will be killed to gratify a piece of malignant spite." This was the signal for another outburst of hisses, cheers, groans, cat calls, and yelling. At length Mr. Underhill withdrew the last remark, and order was once more restored. Mr. George Bend made a motion that a special meeting of the Executive Committee of the Exchange be called for March 8, to consider a resolution, which he offered, dissolving the Exchange on April 30, 1877, and requiring them to pay all outstanding indebtedness and distribute the whole balance might remain pro-rata among the members. Amid cries of dissent the Chairman ruled the motion out of order as revolutionary and unconstitutional. He suggested, however, that the same object might be attained by making an amendment to the by-laws under which the possibility of dissolution might be provided for. More confusion ensued, and a motion to adjourn was declared to be carried.

The necessary amendment is to be drawn up at once, and it will be posted to-day. It must remain posted 10 days before being acted upon. It requires the signatures of only five members.

OPEN BOARD OF BROKERS.

The temporary rooms of the new Open Board of Stock Brokers were formally opened at 9:45 o'clock yesterday morning. The rooms are situated on the first floor of No. 21 New-street, with entrances on that street and Broadway. They have been newly painted and fitted up with new signs, gas brackets, furniture, and telegraphic instruments since Saturday, and presented quite a business-like appearance. Over the door on New-street is a large sign: "Temporary Rooms New-York Open Board of Stock Brokers." Substantial railings inside the two doors mark the line of demarkation between the members and the outer public. An oak platform and desk are in the centre of the room for the use of the presiding officers. On the Broadway side is a partitioned office for the accommodation of the Secretaries. Small signs, bearing the names of the various securities dealt in, are affixed to the wall at intervals. The rooms are low and badly lighted, and the gas was kept burning all day. The opening was marked by a Bear raid on Western Union, and several suspicious sales were effected below the closing price of Saturday, to which the stock immediately afterward jumped, and about 200 shares were disposed of. Then Mr. Underhill offered any part of 1,000 shares of New-York Central at 93½, and got rid of a few hundred at that price. These comprised about all the transactions until the hour for opening the New-York Stock Exchange, when the members rushed out in a body, leaving the rooms almost deserted, a condition in which they remained all day. A crowd of members of the New-York Exchange stood on the opposite side of the street, and when the open board appeared, began hooting at them and making uncomplimentary remarks in regard to the extent of business transacted. They were answered back with interest, but the utmost good humor prevailed on both sides, and in a few moments the excitement had entirely subsided.

A NEW ISSUE OF RAILROAD BONDS.

The Chicago and Rock Island Railway Company have issued a circular announcing that they have determined to put upon the market $10,000,000 40 year 6 per cent. currency bonds in redemption of the present outstanding 7 per cent. sinking fund mortgage bonds which mature Sept. 1, 1886, but are now subject to call. The present debt of the road is stated to consist of $9,000,000 7 per cent. and $1,000,000 6 per cent. bonds, the proposed new issue being assigned solely to take up this indebtedness, although the company reserve the right to issue $2,500,000 of this series in addition to the $10,000,000 for permanent improvements, extension, &c., the property thus acquired to be included in the mortgage. The capital of the company, authorized by law, is $25,000,000, of which only $20,950,000 have been issued.

SOUTHERN RAILROAD REORGANIZATION.

An adjourned meeting of the bondholders of the Mississippi Central and New-Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroads was held in the office of the Illinois Central Railway Company, No. 31 Nassau-street, yesterday forenoon. Both roads are under foreclosure and are about to be sold, the latter on March 17. No date has been fixed for the sale of the other, but it will probably take place in the Spring. The two roads connect, forming a continuous line between Cairo and New-Orleans. An authorized representative of the English bondholders was present at the meeting having arrived in this country two days previously. In all $5,600,000 of bonds were represented. On motion a committee consisting of Judge Emott, W. H. Osborn, W. H. Macy, and J. B. Alexander were appointed a committee to draft a plan for the purchase and reorganization of both railroads under one management in the interest of the bondholders, and to report at a future meeting. The meeting then adjourned.

DUPING A BOARDING-HOUSE KEEPER

THE "OWNER OF TEXAS LANDS AND VALUABLE MINING STOCKS" GETS TWO MONTH'S BOARD AND PAYS FOR IT WITH WORTHLESS CHECKS—HE ALSO BORROWS $75 FROM HIS TRUSTING LANDLADY—AND STILL HE IS "SHORT"

John L. Davis, a well-dressed young man of prepossessing appearance and engaging manners, was arraigned before Justice Flammer, at the Washington-place Police Court yesterday, charged with having swindled Miss Anne Higgins, of No. 57 West Twenty-first-street, by giving her worthless checks on the Murray Hill Bank. According to the statements made by Miss Higgins, who keeps a boarding-house at the above number, it appears that on Jan. 2, Davis took board at her house, and remained there until last Saturday. He represented himself to be in good circumstances, and his appearance indicated that his representations were correct. He claimed to own extensive grazing lands in Texas, and said he was the possessor of profitable mining and other stocks, and also owned a house and lot in Forty-seventh-street. Miss Higgins was pleased to have such a boarder, and when the first week's board became due she failed to ask for a settlement, but on the contrary, from time to time lent Davis various small sums, as he claimed to be short of ready money, his remittances having been delayed in some unaccountable manner. After Davis had been there for a month, the landlady asked him for a settlement. He said he had no cash to spare but gave Miss Higgins a check on a Southern bank for the amount of his indebtedness. The check was sent to the bank on which it was drawn, through the Second National Bank of this City, and in due time was returned protested, as the drawer had no account there. Davis said that there must be some mistake about the matter, and, Miss Higgins becoming importunate, he gave her a note at four days for $188 92-100, being the amount he then owed her. When this note matured it was not paid, but Miss Higgins did not seem to lose confidence in her boarder, and allowed his account to run on until the 23d inst., when Davis gave her a check for $244 on the Murray Hill Bank in full settlement of his account. The next morning Davis told Miss Higgins that he was in immediate need of $75, and requested the lady to send his check for that amount to the Second National Bank with her indorsement so that she could get the money for him at once. As he had previously told Miss Higgins that he had succeeded in negotiating a large loan, and that the money had been deposited to his credit in the Murray Hill Bank, she indorsed his check and sent it to the Second National Bank, with a request for the cash. The money was sent to her, and she handed it over to Davis. The next day Miss Higgins was ill and did not go out, but on Saturday she went to the Murray Hill bank with the check given her by Davis, and was there informed that it was worthless, the drawer having no account there. The check for $75 was also returned with the same statement. Miss Higgins was also informed that Davis had had an account with the bank, which was closed in 1874, and also that a number of checks had been presented at the bank, signed by Davis, lately, by various tradesmen who had been duped by him. Miss Higgins was loth to believe that her boarder was a swindler. When asked to explain, Davis made so many plausible excuses that no steps were taken to apprehend him until Saturday night, when Miss Higgins discovered that he had packed his valise and was preparing to leave, whereupon she caused his arrest. On being searched a bank-book, showing his old account in the Murray Hill Bank, with subsequent entries, evidently made in his own handwriting for the purpose of showing several thousand dollars to his credit, was found. There was also found a $1,000 bond of the Chesapeake and Ohio Coal and Lumber Company, purporting to be a 6 per cent., first mortgage gold bond, signed by Daniel Sickles as President, and John W. Simons as Treasurer, which is said to be worthless and have been used by the accused to obtain credit. It was stated in court that Davis had been quite wealthy and had been engaged in the lime and plaster business in this City, but of late has made his living by preying upon too confiding boarding-house keepers. The accused was remanded for examination.

THE DEATH OF KATY REIDEL.

NEW EVIDENCE CONCERNING HER RELATIONS WITH WELDSPIEL—THE MYSTERY NOT YET EXPLAINED.

The mystery of the death by poison of the girl, Katy Reidel, on Staten Island, still continues to baffle detection. The publication, however, of the facts connected with the affair have resulted in eliciting new evidence concerning the relations between Weldspiel and the girl, which leaves the former more than ever under suspicion. Among those whose attention has been called to the case by the details published in THE TIMES is Mr. L. Levy, of No. 69 Bowery, who at one time employed the deceased in his household. This gentleman stated to a TIMES reporter yesterday that he was much surprised at the action of the Staten Island Coroner in discharging Weldspiel without a more thorough examination of the previous history of both himself and the dead woman. Mr. Levy says that Katy first came to his house on the 20th of December, 1875, in the capacity of wet-nurse. She was a handsome girl, with a good figure, blonde hair, and light blue eyes. She said that she was born in Boston, of German parents, and represented that her husband had deserted her. Her child, which was about four weeks old, was placed in the care of a former domestic of Mr. Levy, a Mrs. Wolbart, and Katy used to visit it occasionally. During the period of her service with Mr. Levy, Katie received the visits of Weldspiel, whom she first introduced as her brother, and afterward confessed was her husband. Weldspiel, who professed himself a piano-maker by trade, was very jealous of the girl, and the latter frequently told Mr. Levy and his wife that she was afraid that some day he would kill her. She shunned his society as much as she possibly could without exciting his open hatred, and in other ways exhibited a fear of the man which to those about her seemed unreasonable. She excused herself for having first representing him as her brother by saying that she was afraid she might not have secured the engagement, a husband being considered an incumbrance to one in her station. Weldspiel generally called three times a week, and on Sundays sometimes accompanied Katy to the house of Mrs. Wolbart, in Lewis-street, where her child was. Even to these people, who were comparative strangers, Weldspiel's jealousy of her, and her evident fear of him, were apparent. Among these people Weldspiel was universally regarded as the father of Katy's child. He is described as being a sinister looking person, and yet one who could render himself agreeable when he wished.

COLORING SUGARS WITH CARAMEL.

A dispatch was received yesterday afternoon by the Custom-house authorities from Prof. Henry, of the Smithsonian Institute, giving the result of his analysis of specimens of Demerara centrifugal sugar submitted to him by the Treasury Department on suspicion that they were artificially colored for the purpose of passing through the Custom-house at a low rate of duty. He confirms the report previously made to the authorities in this City by Mr. Habirshaw, that the sugars were colored with caramel or some liquid of which caramel forms a component part. Caramel is the extract of burnt sugar. Col. Alexander, Special Agent of the Treasury has been investigating these alleged frauds for over a year, and has secured evidence, which, in addition to the reports of Prof. Henry and Mr. Habirshaw, will, he thinks, convict the guilty parties. There are six cargoes implicated, and a test case will be begun in the United States courts in a few days. The sugar was consigned to Leaycraft & Co., of this City; Trowbridge & Sons, of New-Haven; J. F. Whitney & Co., of Boston, and two other firms whose names are withheld for the present. The duties on sugars are graded according to color and the alleged frauds consisted in artificially darkening light-colored sugars with a substance that can be readily bleached when necessary. It is claimed on the part of the importers that caramel being derived from sugar-cane, no law is violated in mixing it with sugar; but the Customs authorities say that the intent to defraud is all they will be called upon to prove. They are of opinion besides that the coloring matter used contains other ingredients than caramel, which are calculated to hasten the bleaching process. This theory, however, is still under investigation, the analyses not yet being completed.

BUSINESS FAILURES.

William F. Meyers made an assignment of his property, for the benefit of creditors, to John R. Pape yesterday.

Register Allen has appointed John H. Platt Assignee in bankruptcy of Henry A. Smalley, President of the New-York and Nova Scotia Stone Company, of No. 23 Park-row.

A. & W. Chapin & Brother, lumber dealers, at the foot of West Twenty-third-street, have been adjudicated involuntary bankrupts on the petition of their creditors before Register Fitch.

Goodsell, Budillon & Co., kid glove importers, of No. 342 Broadway, and at Boston, have failed with heavy liabilities. Negotiations are in progress for a settlement, and in the meantime the effects of the firm have been placed in the hands of an Assignee.

MURDER IN ONTARIO.

WINDSOR, Feb. 26.—Frederick Apple, an old resident, was shot here to-day by a man named Humphreys, an employe of Mr. Apple. The shooting arose out of a dispute about wages. Humphreys was arrested.

THE BOYD WHISKY TRIAL.

A CROOKED GOVERNMENT WITNESS.

CONTINUATION OF THE TRIAL OF F. O. BOYD & CO. FOR CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD—A WITNESS FOR THE GOVERNMENT CHANGES FRONT—A MOTION TO AMEND THE BILL OF PARTICULARS DENIED—THE CASE PROBABLY ENDED.

The case in which Francis O. Boyd and Edgar P. Hill, composing the firm of F. O. Boyd & Co., are charged with conspiring to defraud the Government of the tax on whisky consigned to them, was resumed yesterday morning in the United States District Court, before Judge Blatchford, Assistant United States District Attorney Roger M. Sherman appearing for the Government, and ex-United States District Attorney Benjamin F. Tracy and Gen. Henry L. Burnett for the defense.

Mr. Sherman continued the examination of William S. Golsen, of the firm of Golsen & Eastman, rectifiers, in Chicago, who had shipped large quantities of whisky to defendants to be sold by them on commission, which it was charged by the Government had been removed by Golsen & Eastman from the distillery of R. C. Mersereau, in Chicago, and shipped to defendants without the tax being paid, in pursuance of a conspiracy entered into between Golsen & Eastman and defendants. Golsen testified that his firm's rectifying establishment was on River-street, Chicago; his firm had received whisky, "crooked" and "straight," from several distillers; he could not remember about receiving any "crooked" whisky from Mersereau, but recollected about receiving "straight" whisky from him.

Q.—Did you see either of the defendants after the court adjourned on Friday last? A.—I went to their office on business on Saturday.

Q.—Did you talk to Boyd about this case? A.—I did not.

Witness, resuming, said his firm paid for "straight" whisky the regular Chicago market price, and for "crooked" whisky 15 cents per gallon less; witness' memory was affected by a severe illness, so that he could not remember details about many matters; witness' firm had received "crooked" whisky from Russell, Powell, Cooper, Fuller, Abraham, and Miller; the firm had never emptied Mersereau's "crooked" whisky into tubs, but had sent it to vinegar factories, and had kept no account of it on their books; witness had asked Boyd some time ago why so much whisky was seized, and why he was not molested, and Boyd replied that he understood his business. Letters from F. O. Boyd & Co. to witness' firm were identified. They were in reference to the sales of whisky by defendants' firm for Golsen & Eastman. One letter, in reference to whisky sent, recited that "It is hard to sell these lots without making great sacrifices," another that "we sold this alcohol at the best prices we could under the circumstances," and a third that "we are not a little surprised that, while we are selling your goods under such circumstances, you should go back on us." Letter copy books of witness' firm were identified by witness, who also identified several copies of letters in them, some as being in the handwriting of Moorley and others in that of Leet.

Mr. Sherman here said that the testimony of the witness had been a surprise to the Government, as it was different in many essentials from that given by him before the Grand Jury. The witness had undoubtedly conferred with the defendants, and concluded to modify his testimony. In view of this fact Mr. Sherman asked the court that the strict rules of examining the witness on the presumption that he was favoring the Government should be relaxed, as it was quite evident now that he was a witness hostile to the prosecution.

Judge Blatchford said that he had, to a great extent, proceeded on the assumption that the witness was hostile to the Government, and had certainly so considered since Friday.

Mr. Sherman said that he had not learned to a certainty until noon yesterday that the witness was a hostile one, and he wanted, in view of this discovery, and the peculiar testimony which had been given by the witness in reference to the lots of whisky specified in the bill of particulars supplementing the indictment, to show that the bill of particulars should either be modified, or testimony be permitted to be given for the Government in relation to "crooked" whisky not specified in the bill of particulars. If the Government failed in the case it would be on account of being confined to the bill of particulars. The Government had been obliged to specify certain lots of "crooked" whisky, and had enumerated thirty-one, and it would be claimed by the defense that, by the evidence of the witness on the stand, these lots were to vinegar manufactories instead of being sent to the defendants, and the defense would ask a dismissal on the allegation of variance between the charges and the evidence. Thus far the witnesses called by the Government had been favorable to the defense, and hostile to the Government. The defense had asked and obtained a bill of particulars on the ground that the indictment was too general in its character for them to meet, and the Government had done the best it could under the circumstances, and had been and was at the mercy of witnesses on whom it could not rely. If the bill of particulars could be amended, it could be shown to the court that the main charge in the indictment was true. If the defendants were guilty, they should not be allowed to go free on account of a technical adherence to the bill of particulars. A bill of particulars was not to hamper the Government, but to inform the defendants of the substantial charge against them. It appeared from the testimony thus far that the whisky mentioned in the bill of particulars was not received by defendants, but went somewhere else. In reality, the identity of the whisky was not the material part of the charge. Since Friday the relations of the witness and defendants had been very amicable, and their old business relations had been also renewed. The case was a very difficult one for the Government from the fact that it covered a conspiracy relating to acts in two distant cities, and that a bill of particulars had been obtained setting forth facts giving a great inducement to the defense to tamper with witnesses for the Government. It would now be difficult, if not impossible, to prove that the "crooked" whisky had been sent to New-York, and the bill of particulars should be so modified as to permit the showing of a conspiracy, formed in this City, to remove, or cause to be removed, "crooked" whisky from a distillery or distilleries in Chicago, and that the overt act of removal had occurred.

Gen. Tracey said that the motion was to amend the bill of particulars so as to show merely that whisky had been unlawfully and fraudulently removed from distilleries. It was alleged that the defendants had conspired in New-York to defraud the Government of tax on whisky in Mersereau's distillery, and that in pursuance of this conspiracy Golsen & Eastman did remove the whisky from the distillery. Counsel had nothing to say in justification of the rule in this district granting a bill of particulars in a criminal case. This rule had been almost unheard of outside of the Southern District of New-York. As such a rule obtained here, however, the office of a bill of particulars was to limit the case, and when it was granted, to eke out the insufficiency of an indictment, it ought to be strictly construed. The indictment itself, in the present case, irrespective of the bill of particulars, simply showed that the Grand Jury did not know that the defendants had committed any crime or offense known to the laws of the United States. The defendants came prepared to meet the charges in the indictment and the bill of particulars, and the Government should be restricted to the proof of those charges. The charge, substantially, was that a conspiracy had been formed in this City for the delivery of "crooked" whisky, thereafter to be produced at a distillery then unknown in the City of Chicago. It had not been shown that the defendants ever had an interview in this City in reference to the formation of the conspiracy charged. The indictment itself was utterly insufficient, and the bill of particulars recited that Golsen & Eastman had illicitly removed whisky. The Government now announced, on the third day of the trial, that it was surprised by its own witness. If permission to amend the bill of particulars were granted, it would have the effect of ousting the court of its jurisdiction of the offense, which would, in effect, under the amendment, have originated and been completed in Chicago. The charge was a conspiracy to defraud the Government by non-payment of tax on distilled whisky, and the distillery must, under the law, be the place where the crime was committed, for it was removal from a distillery that constituted the crime, and the Government had no evidence that a conspiracy was formed in New-York. Even if a conspiracy had been formed in New-York, the overt act had been committed in Chicago, and the case should be tried there if at all. The defense indignantly repelled the charge of having tampered with the Government witness. Golsen had simply gone to defendants' office to write a letter, and if any of his firm dealt with the defendants now it was not with his consent. If the Government chose to accept witnesses they could not rely on, it was the Government's lookout.

Mr. Sherman said he would withdraw his motion to amend the bill of particulars, and would ask merely that the court would receive evidence offered, or to be offered, of facts sustaining the charge, but not set forth in the bill of particulars.

Gen. Burnett said that while the defense would not contend that the Government should not be permitted to prove something in addition to the bill of particulars, it would insist that the charges in the bill must first be proved. If these charges were not proved the case broke down.

Judge Blatchford said that the motion of Mr. Sherman was made in view of the evidence as it then stood. The idea of the District Attorney was, that this was a conspiracy to remove whisky distilled at Mersereau's distillery, and that Golsen & Eastman caused the whisky to be removed from the distillery to the City of New-York. The view of the defense seemed to be that it had not been shown that the whisky removed to New-York was whisky on which no tax had been paid. When a bill of particulars was granted, if it contained a charge, the bill should be considered a portion of the indictment. A general description of the lots of whisky charged was necessary. To allow the amendment of a bill of particulars would be equivalent to allowing an amendment of an indictment—a thing unheard of. If the charges were as vague as claimed, the Grand Jury ought never to have found an indictment. This was not a case for the discretion of the court, and the application of the District Attorney could not be granted.

The further hearing of the case was then adjourned to 11 o'clock this morning. After the adjournment counsel for the defense said that the ruling of Judge Blatchford virtually ended the case; but Mr. Sherman said he would go on with the case for the Government this morning, and resume the examination of the witness Golsen.

DELAWARE AND HUDSON CANAL.

A NEW APPLICATION TO BE MADE TO THE SUPREME COURT FOR A RECEIVER—OUTLINE OF THE COMPLAINT.

The officers of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company have been notified that a new application is to be made to the Supreme Court for a Receiver on behalf of Henry R. Anderson on Monday next. The complaint is the same as that upon which Judge Donohue granted an order (which he rescinded next day) a short time ago, with the addition of affidavits by the plaintiff that on Feb. 15 and 16 he was refused permission to examine the books of the company; that within the past few days the defendants have issued about $1,500,000 bonds to pay the floating debt of the company; that the company is running under a double loss from unprofitable coal mining and expensive leased roads; that the stock has depreciated from $125 to $50 per share, and that none of the Directors have purchased any stock at this reduced price, from all of which he argues that the company is insolvent. He derives from the recently published statement of the company a confirmation of this theory and makes out that the liabilities are shown to be $3,120,776 13, and the assets only $2,687,821 19, many of them, as he claims, worthless. He says that the principal and interest of the bonds and dividends on stocks of other railroad stocks and bonds embraced in the assets are gharanteed by the company and should not be included in the assets, but rather in the liabilities of the company. There is also an affidavit by C. Porter Sumner, who describes himself as a "public auditor and expert accountant." He goes into an extended analysis of the official reports of the company for 1865 and 1866, and deduces gross mismanagement during those years, there being 88 per cent. decrease in profits as against only 46 per cent. decrease in sales shown. He says that the present deficit of the company under a forced sale would not be less than $9,242,103 53, and that allowing liberal prices for its assets it will be insolvent as the end of the current year by over $2,000,000 should the present policy of management be continued. The officers of the Company say that no such person as the plaintiff named is down on their books as a stockholder, and the name of Henry R. Anderson does not appear in the City Directory. Mr. Anderson, however, is not a myth. He was formerly a stock broker of influence and wealth, and is still connected with the Street in a small way. It is believed that he is acting for others. President Dickson yesterday morning issued a card stating that all the allegations in the complaint would be fully met and answered. Up to this time the news of the proposed application had no effect, but after the bulletin was read was made on the stock, and it fell several per cent. The enemies of the company seem to be very determined. 'Yesterday copies of the Albany Law Journal, containing an editorial article severely reflecting upon Judge Donohue for his action in the matter of the previous application were hawked about, and the rumor was extensively circulated that another application for a Receiver was to have been made yesterday afternoon on the part of an unnamed bondholder.

FUNERAL OF GEN. AGUILERA.

THE REMAINS DEPOSITED IN A VAULT IN THE MARBLE CEMETERY—IMPOSING CEREMONIES IN THE CHURCH OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER.

The funeral of Major Gen. Francisco Vicente Aguilera, ex-Vice President of the insurrectionary Government of Cuba, took place yesterday at 9:30 A. M., from the City Hall, where the remains had been lying in state since Sunday morning. At the hour named the pall-bearers, Gen. Martin T. McMahon, Gen. Charles K. Graham, Mr. Charles A. Dana, Mr. Miguel Aldama, Mr. J. A. Echeverria, Mr. José L. Ramirez, Mr. J. J. Govantes, Mr. J. J. Polo, Mr. Plutarco Gonzalez, Mr. Leandro Rodrigues, and Mr. J. M. Macias, accompanied by deputations from the different Cuban societies of this City, the mourners, Messrs. Antonio and Hilario Aguilera, sons of the deceased, Col. A. Aguilera, and Mr. M. F. Martinez, his cousins, and a deputation of eight Cuban ladies, headed by the widow of ex-President Carlos Manuel Cespedes, of Cuba, proceeded to the City Hall, where a hearse was in waiting to convey the body to the church. Representatives of the Cuban societies then bore the casket containing the body from the Governor's Room, and placed it in the hearse in which it was carried to the Roman Catholic Church of St. Francis Xavier, Sixteenth-street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues, the pall-bearers and others following in carriages. Upon arriving at the church, which was already well filled by the friends and acquaintances of the deceased, the casket was carried down the main aisle and placed in front of the altar on a catafalque which had been prepared for the occasion, and four large lighted candles were placed around it. Over the lower part of the casket the Cuban flag, described in THE TIMES of yesterday, was gracefully draped, and on the upper part were laid a beautiful wreath of white flowers with the inscription Tus Hijas, ("From thy Daughters.) in violets, and a large crown of white flowers surmounted by a cross, sent by Mrs. Cespedes. A solemn requiem mass was then celebrated by Rev. Father Pellettier, the Pastor of the church, and assistants. During the ceremony the choir sang the beautiful requiem mass by Cherubini, the Inflammatus from the Stabat Mater, and "Angels ever bright and fair." Dr. William Berge presided at the organ, and the solos were sung by Miss Teresa Wernecke. Just before the conclusion of the ceremony a beautiful star of red roses, the emblem of martyrdom, sent by Mrs. Cirilos Rebello, was laid on the lower part of the casket. When the mass was over the remains were removed from the church to the street, and were there taken by a body of Cuban colored men, who had requested to be allowed the privilege of carrying their dead leader to the vault, as a mark of their respect to the memory of the man who was the first to liberate his slaves in Cuba. No regular order of procession was observed, and the body, followed by the pall-bearers, the Cuban societies, and an immense crowd of citizens, was carried to the Marble Cemetery, in Second-avenue, near Second-street, the ladies and some of the friends of the family following in carriages. Upon reaching the cemetery the remains were placed in the large receiving vault, where they will remain until they can be carried to Cuba for interment. The silver plate on the lid of the casket bore the following inscription: "Francisco Vicente Aguilera. Nació en Bayamo, Cuba, el dia 23 de Junio de 1821, y Murió en New-York el dia 22 de Febrero de 1877." Francisco Vicente Aguilera, born in Bayamo, Cuba, June 22, 1821, died in New-York, February 22, 1877.

THE BROOKLYN ALDERMEN.

NO ATTEMPT MADE TO BREAK THE DEADLOCK—MR. STRANAHAN'S NOMINATION AS PARK COMMISSIONER REJECTED.

Beyond indulging in a great deal of debate the Brooklyn Aldermen did very little at yesterday's session. No attempt was made to organize the board, the Republicans having failed to agree on a candidate during the week. Alderman Burnett (Republican) moved that the names of J. S. T. Stranahan, William Marshal, and A. B. Bayliss, nominated by the Mayor some weeks ago as Park Commissioners, be taken from the table. The motion prevailed, and after a great deal of discussion as to whether the names should be voted on collectively or singly, a vote was taken on a motion offered by Alderman Burnett to confirm J. S. T. Stranahan as President of the Park Commission. Before the roll was called, Alderman Griswold (Republican) delivered an elaborate oration. He said he respected and revered Mr. Stranahan; that his name was "like the dawn of a Spring morning," but that he could not vote for him. Mr. Stranahan, the speaker said, represented a system of extravagant expenditure which the people wanted stopped. Alderman Fisher (Republican) said that the rejection of Mr. Stranahan's name would be the darkest day's work the Common Council had ever done. He could not conceive of a Park Commission organized during Mr. Stranahan's life-time of which that gentleman was not a member. The motion to confirm was lost by a vote of 23 to 2, Aldermen Burnett and Fisher voting in the affirmative. The name of William Marshal was next taken up and confirmed. Mr. A. B. Bayliss' name was rejected. Mr. Stranahan holds over as President of the Park Commission until the appointment of two Park Commissioners, that number constituting a quorum.

The bill of Messrs Arthur Crooks and Charles Gaylin, the architects employed to inspect the public buildings of the city, was referred to the Committee on Finance. The bill amounts to $2,542.

A communication from the Board of City Works requesting the confirmation of an assessment was referred to the Corporation Counsel for an opinion as to whether the Board of Aldermen was sufficiently organized to confirm an assessment. After the transaction of some routine business, the board adjourned until next Monday.

VACANCIES IN THE PRESIDENCY.

DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S SCHEME FORCED THROUGH THE HOUSE—DANGERS OF THE MEASURE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—The proceedings of the House to-day were distinguished more for what the majority attempted and failed to do than for what they succeeded in doing. After completing the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole and reporting it to the House, instead of going on and passing it finally, Mr. Holman yielded the floor and David Dudley Field came forward with his bill to amend the Revised Statutes in respect to vacancies in the offices of President and Vice President. The previous question was ordered on the final passage of the bill, one half hour being first allowed for discussion. [The bill is printed in full elsewhere.]

Mr. Kasson call attention to the loose phraseology of the bill, and suggested to Mr. Field that a measure of so much importance should not be hastily acted upon. Under the provisions of the bill either house would have the power to defeat an election by the people, and by refusing to concur in a declaration of the result precipitate the very emergency which the bill seeks to avoid. The language of the bill is that whenever the Electoral count is not completed from any cause the President of the Senate shall act as President of the United States. This has the appearance of an invitation to one house to defeat the announcement of the election. The bill is immature, and time should be given for full discussion of so important a measure. Mr. Lawrence opposed the bill upon the ground that it conferred dangerous powers. It would enable the Senate to defeat the popular will and set up their own President as President of the United States. Mr. Neal, a Democrat from Ohio, was unwilling to vote for any bill providing for a new election, and protested against the leadership of the distinguished Republican (referring to Field) who lately came from New-York to lead the Democracy in the House. He warned the Democrats that they had been deceived in the Electoral act, and if they passed this bill they would be again deceived. The effect of the present bill would be to make Oliver P. Morton President of the United States and he would rather take Gov. Hayes for four years than Morton for four months, or four days. Messrs. Seelye and Banks also spoke briefly against the measure, after which Mr. Field spoke for five minutes, to show that the bill was constitutional, and calculated to meet in the future such emergencies as we are now threatened with, and prevent a possible interregnum in the Presidential office. The bill was passed by yeas 138, nays 109, several Democrats voting in the negative.

THE PLANS OF THE FILIBUSTERS.

PROGRAMME OF THE REVOLUTIONISTS—THE COUNT TO BE OBSTRUCTED IN EVERY POSSIBLE MANNER—GRAND SCHEME OF A MEMBER FROM ILLINOIS—A CONSTANT MENACE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—The revolutionists appear to be without a settled programme for their guidance to-morrow, but they are determined they will obstruct the count in every possible manner. There will be motions for recesses, and attempts to secure the reading of long documents. Vermont will certainly be objected to, and perhaps Virginia, where a Democratic Elector was disqualified. Springer and Field would doubtless be willing to object to every Democratic State if they could find any plausible ground, but the party generally will not be pleased with any appearance of questioning their own vote. But those who are pledged to filibustering are too crazy and empty headed to consider the appearance or effect of anything that promises to consume time. The report that all the Democratic as well as the Republican States are to be objected to may therefore prove to be true. The prospects of success for the obstructionists cannot be regarded to-night as changed, for no information of any change in their numbers has been discovered, and without an accession of about 40 or 50 votes since their last disclosure of strength they can accomplish nothing. Springer thinks he laid a mine to-day when he offered the resolutions recognizing the Democratic Governors in Louisiana and South Carolina. He thinks the Republican vote against suspending the rules will consolidate Southern members of Congress, and that they will all be found voting hereafter to break up the count. Springer's grand schemes are nearly always back-acting in their results, and this latest invention of his may turn out like his celebrated amendment to the Centennial Appropriation bill. It can only be stated generally of the possible success of delay, that it is not to be lightly treated, and that it is a constant menace to the conclusion of the count. At the same time the probability remains, as heretofore, that the law will be fully executed on Thursday or Friday.

MR. CONKLING'S POSITION.

LATEST PLANS OF THE CONSPIRATORS—THE NEW-YORK SENATOR TO BE CHOSEN PRESIDENT PRO TEM.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—There is a claim made to-night that 13 Republican Senators will vote for the Field bill for a new election, and that Mr. Conkling can certainly be elected President of the Senate by a union of Democratic and Republican votes, which are said to be already pledged. Five of those privately named as thus pledged deny the statement. On the Democratic side this scheme is in earnest, and they really look upon Mr. Conkling as the man for the Democrats to secure as President ad interim. People cannot very well help asking what this means, and Mr. Voorhees' letter, which denies nothing save those things which were never asserted, is not quite satisfying. There are some plans of certain conspirators which are not declared, and which will only be learned when they are attempted to be put in execution. But the grand necessity for the success of the plot is a majority of votes in the House.

VIOLENT SPEECHES APPLAUDED.

MEETING OF A REFORM CLUB, SO CALLED—A GATHERING OF LAZY LADS AND DISAPPOINTED OFFICE-SEEKERS—THE MOST VIOLENT SPEECHES MOST WARMLY APPLAUDED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—At Talmadge Hall, in this city, to-night, a motley crowd of disappointed office seekers, and a number of idle boys, calling themselves the Tilden and Hendricks Reform Club of Washington, assembled for the avowed purpose of protesting against the progress of the Electoral count. The notorious Donn Piatt was the presiding genius of the affair, and his appearance upon the platform was greeted with wild shouts of approval. Col. F. A. Conkling, of New-York, was announced to speak, but sent a telegraphic apology, saying that he sincerely regretted his inability to attend. The crowd was addressed by Messrs. Scott, of Pennsylvania; Hunton, of Virginia; Julian, of Indiana; Gen. Young, of Georgia, and a number of others, who demanded in the strongest terms that the count cease. Mr. Young was particularly violent. He wanted the whole Presidential question referred back to the people, and denounced the Democratic leaders from the South for their recent action. The most violent speeches were the most warmly applauded.

THE TALKING AGAINST TIME.

MONTGOMERY BLAIR AND JERRY BLACK THROWN INTO THE CASE WITHOUT PREPARATION—RAMBLING SPEECH OF THE FORMER—BLACK'S INSULTING ADDRESS—GARRULITY AND BAD TEMPER THE CHARACTERISTICS OF BOTH.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—The Electoral Commission met at 10 o'clock this morning, and the arguments on the South Carolina case were concluded at 1:10. In the first part of the session the court-room was almost deserted, and few persons besides those connected with the management of the case were present. Mr. Hurd, of Ohio, on behalf of the Democratic objectors, spoke nearly an hour, attempting to sustain the objections offered in the joint meeting to counting the votes of the Hayes Electors. Mr. Hurd is regarded as one of the ablest young lawyers of the House, but he found it difficult to construct an argument, and his speech was full of assertions instead of reasons. Mr. Cochrane, of Pennsylvania, a disciple of Jerry Black, who has imbibed all the bitterness of that distinguished antediluvian, without having a particle of his wit, attempted to convince the Commission that they could take proof concerning certain allegations which he presented in the form of a proffer of evidence. The Republican objectors were Representative Lawrence and Senator Christiancy. Mr. Lawrence spoke about half an hour, reviewing the objections to the Hayes votes, which he showed were legal and ought to be counted. He spent no time in referring to the Tilden certificate, being reminded by a member of the Commission that nobody on the other side had claimed that the Tilden vote should be counted, and therefore no argument need be wasted upon it. Senator Christiancy declined to speak.

It lacked 15 minutes to 12 when the Democratic counsel, Montgomery Blair, began his speech. Mr. Blair had been called suddenly into the case and had not examined the points of law, and was without any notes or material for argument. He floundered about like a man in deep water, and finally concluded with a very brief speech. The counsel on the Republican side decided to make no argument in the case. Judge Shellabarger announced that they were willing to leave the subject with the Commission to act upon the information already before it. They objected formally to the taking of testimony as asked by the Democratic side. Judge Black, who had the closing speech for the Democrats, availed himself of the privilege, and after remarking that he was not prepared to argue the South Carolina case, he proceeded to speak in a general way in very much the style and manner that would have been proper if he had been addressing the indignation meeting of employes of the House and temporary residents of Washington in search of office which assembled at Tallmadge Hall to-night. He insulted the Commission in the course of his speech, and behaved in a way which led many persons to suppose that he was under the influence of drink; but such is said not to have been the fact. Black was indecent and insulting, and disgusted some of the Democratic Commissioners, who took pains to show their displeasure by conspicuously reading some papers or pamphlets. The old gentleman is past the age when he is physically able to make long speeches, though the bitterness of his nature is not abated. He concluded soon after 1 o'clock without having advanced an argument or done anything but abuse the Commission. The brevity of his speech was accepted as compensation for his abuse, and at 1:10 the Commission took a half hour's recess preparatory to consulting on its decision.

LOUISIANA AND SOUTH CAROLINA.

UNSUCCESSFUL EFFORTS TO RECOGNIZE NICHOLLS AND HAMPTON—DEFEAT OF TWO ATTEMPTS TO SUSPEND THE RULES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—Under the rules of the House it is in order to move a suspension of the rules for any purpose during the last six days of the session. Taking advantage of this, the Democrats to-day made two unsuccessful efforts to pass resolutions recognizing Nicholls and Hampton as the lawful Governors of Louisiana and South Carolina. Mr. Schleicher got in the first attempt, which was defeated by yeas 156, nays 93. Mr. Watterson next tried his hand, reciting as a preamble a telegram alleged to have been sent last night by President Grant, in which the belief is expressed that the Nicholls Government would and ought to be recognized as the lawful Government of Louisiana. The resolution attached indorsed the sentiments of the preamble, and proposed to give them the official sanction of Congress, but the House refused to suspend the rules by yeas 127, nays 85.

CONGRESSMAN GLOVER DENOUNCED

AN EX-MEMBER OF CONGRESS BEFORE THE REAL ESTATE POOL COMMITTEE—HOW HE WAS DETAINED IN WASHINGTON, AND WHY—A POSITIVE CONTRADICTION TO AN ATROCIOUS SLANDER.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—Mr. Glover, Chairman of the House Committee on the Real Estate Pool, has at last brought trouble upon himself by his novel manner of conducting investigations. Mr. Glover has been in the habit of subpœaning witnesses to give evidence reflecting upon individuals, without giving the parties assailed an opportunity to meet the accusations. All Winter he has been examining witnesses in secret without the presence of other members of the committee, who have been purposely kept in ignorance of the fact that such examinations were to be made. In this manner Mr. Glover has collected a mass of scandal which he wants the House to order printed, and of the scandalous contents of which no one is informed except Mr. Glover and a dependent who hangs around the committee-room to assist him and supply the places of members of the committee. To-day ex-Congressman Eldredge, of Wisconsin, succeeded in getting the committee together, and read a statement denouncing Glover for his trickery in preventing Eldridge from testifying in his own defense in reply to some star-chamber testimony reflecting upon his integrity as a member of the last Congress. Mr. Eldredge charged Glover with having said to Mr. Pratt, of Iowa, a member of the committee, that he [Glover] wanted to ruin Eldridge politically, and for this purpose desired to have him examined. Glover denied having made such statements, but Pratt insisted that he had, and for a few minutes there was a lively controversy between the two gentlemen. Pratt is willing to take his oath that Glover disclosed to him the plot to ruin Eldredge, and Eldredge has no doubt there was such a plot. The end has not been reached, and Glover may yet find retribution for his villainous treatment of people under investigation.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

EFFORTS TO SECURE NEW LEGISLATION—HOW THEY WERE DISAPPOINTED BY THE SENATE—THE MONEY SPENT BY THE LOBBY THROWN AWAY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—At the last session of Congress the Judiciary Commitee of the Senate reported a bill which provided for the refunding of the money advanced by the United States to the Pacific Railroad. For some time past the agents of the roads have been trying to have some act passed which would be more favorable to them, and they succeeded in having two or three bills introduced, which have been debated at length this Winter. During the last few days they have believed that their scheme would be productive of the best results, but to-day they were cruelly disappointed, for the Senate, by a majority of 1, voted to postpone the whole matter until the next session. All the bills referred to will therefore have to be introduced anew, and the money spent by the lobby this Winter has all been thrown away.

THE POET LONGFELLOW.

CELEBRATING HIS SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY—HOW THE EVENT WAS CELEBRATED AT BOWDOIN COLLEGE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—In accordance with the special request of the poet Longfellow, his seventieth birthday (to-day) was not formally observed here by his friends and admirers, though he was informally called upon at his pleasant and historic home at Cambridge. But at Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me., his Alma Mater, there was quite a formal recognition of the event. At noon the students, Faculty, and all connected with the college assembled in the chapel. With a few happy remarks, President Chamberlain introduced Prof. Packard, who gave a very interesting sketch of the poet's life, especially during his four years in college and immediately after. Among other remarks, Prof. Packard said that he assisted at the entrance-examination of "Young Longfellow." He read a series of resolutions to be sent to Prof. Longfellow as a greeting in behalf of Bowdoin College. The resolutions were seconded by C. W. Morrill, of the Senior class, with a few appropriate remarks, and were then unanimously adopted. A just tribute was paid to the purity and truth of the poet's life. The affair was most pleasant, and was spontaneous and sincere.

THE CHICAGO AND ALTON RAILROAD.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMPANY—THE INCOME ACCOUNT—THE TOTAL OPERATING EXPENSES—GENERAL ASSETS OF THE COMPANY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CHICAGO, Feb. 27.—The annual report of the Chicago and Alton Railroad is just published. The income account for the past year is $5,087,114, of which $4,960,528 were receipts for traffic. The disbursements were $4,825,650, of which operating expenses amounted to $2,804,290. The balance, after eliminating sundry small amounts of bad debts accumulated since 1863, aggregating $238,366, is $23,126 70, which correctly represents the remainder of the accumulated net earnings from traffic. To the foregoing is added the amount of a special fund of $5,00.00 temporarily appropriated from this account for working supplies. The correct balance is, therefore, $528,126. The general assets of the company at the close of the year, in addition to railway and equipments, was about $1,325,000. The net earnings of the Mississippi Bridge were $96,760. The net profit derived from traffic, after deducting all fixed charges, rents, taxes, &c., is equal to 9 per cent. on the share capital of the company, both preferred and common. The aggregate sum expended for improvements was $397,073. The Directors State they are prepared to take any steps to complete a line to Kansas City.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE RESUMPTION OF NAVIGATION—THE FIRST BOATS UP THE RIVER.

Steam boat men report that the Hudson River is open as far north as Poughkeepsie, and that the ice above that point is breaking rapidly. The P. C. Schultz left Pier No. 42 North River on Monday evening, with a full freight, for Cold Spring and New-Hamburg. To-morrow at 5 P. M. the steamer D. B. Hasbrouck and the barge Charles S. Spear, of Homer Ramsdell's Line, will leave Pier No. 35 North River for Highlands, Marlboro, New-Hamburg, and Poughkeepsie. The steamer D. S. Miller, of the same line, will follow on Friday or Saturday. The Catskill boats, Walter Brett and New Champion, have been thoroughly overhauled and repainted, so as to be ready for business next week. On the lower Hudson the boats are making regular trips and carrying full freight. To-morrow the steamer for Fort Lee, Pleasant Valley, and Shady Side will leave Pier No. 42, foot of Canal-street, at 10:30 A. M. and 5:30 P. M. In April the number of trips will be increased. The steamer Alexis is on the route between this City and Yonkers, Nyack, Rockland Lake, and Haverstraw, leaving Pier No. 34 North River daily at 3 P. M. The Wyoming leaves the same pier at the same hour for Perth Amboy and New-Brunswick. For Hastings and Dobb's Ferry, freight and passengers are taken by the propeller Hackensack from Pier No. 34 North River, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, at 3 P. M. The Ansonia is receiving the last touches of paint and gold-leaf, and will be placed on the line to Saugerties. Along the river front the boat owners are busy with the work of preparation for the Spring and Summer traffic. Large sums of money have been expended to make the steamers more attractive than they were last year. This year the Peoples' Line will commence the season with the steamers Drew and Dean Richmond. The St. John will be added when the pleasure travel sets in. During the past Winter these boats have been repainted, the engines overhauled, the steward's department remodeled, and many of the state-rooms refurnished. The workmen have nearly completed their labors, so that the boats can leave in 10 days, but it is probable that the first steamer of this line for Albany will not start before March 20. Last year the first trip was made on April 1, and the last on Dec. 1. The Albany Day Line, Pier No. 39, North River, will run the steamers Daniel Drew and Chauncey Vibbard. New shafts, much heavier than the old ones, and new wheels have been put in the Daniel Drew. The hog-frame has been strengthened, and other extensive repairs made.

THE NOVA SCOTIA GREAT SEAL.

HALIFAX, Feb. 27.—The question which has arisen regarding the validity of the great seal of this province having been referred to to-day in the Assembly, the Provincial Secretary stated correspondence which would shortly be laid before the House would show conclusively that the alarm created concerning the matter, as regards public acts and documents, was totally unfounded.

PRESIDENT-ELECT HAYES.

ON DUTY AT COLUMBUS.

THRONGS OF VISITORS CONGRATULATING THE GOVERNOR AT COLUMBUS—PREPARATIONS FOR THE PRESIDENTIAL TRIP TO WASHINGTON—BELIEF THAT SENATOR SHERMAN WILL BE APPOINTED SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

COLUMBUS, Feb. 27.—The Governor's room at the Capitol has been thronged with visitors to-day, who came to pay their respects to the President elect and congratulate him upon what everybody here regards as a practical end of the Electoral contest. Gov. Hayes himself, however, insists that he is still only Governor of Ohio, and reminds his visitors that Wisconsin is not yet reached in the count, and that their congratulations may possibly be premature. Among the visitors to-day were ex-Gov. Beveridge and Congressman-elect L. Bretano, of Illinois; Judge Johnson, of Cincinnati; A. W. Fairbanks, of Cleveland, and one or two other out-of-town residents of more or less note. Most of the callers, however, were citizens of Columbus and its immediate vicinity, in whose eyes the familiar face of their Governor appears to take on a new and strange interest in view of his early elevation to the Presidency. Very few politicians have made their appearance in Columbus thus far, although a large number of travelers, in passing through the city during the last two days, have availed themselves of the opportunity to stop over a train or two and get a glimpse of the new President. Among them was Demas Barnes, of Brooklyn, who called on the Governor to-day, and he is the only New-Yorker I have seen here.

Gov. Hayes is in constant receipt of telegrams from Washington, informing him of the progress made by the Electoral Commission, and it is the prevailing opinion that the final result will be declared to-morrow, in which case the Presidential party will leave here on Thursday noon, as previously telegraphed. They will go by the regular express train, though special cars will be provided for their accommodation. The Presidential family will consist of Gov. and Mrs. Hayes and three children: Webb C., aged 19; Fannie, aged 8, and Scott Russell, aged 6. The two oldest of the four sons of Gov. Hayes are away from home, one of them attending the Cambridge Law School, and the other is a member of the Junior Class of Cornell University. A party of lady friends of Mrs. Hayes from Cincinnati will accompany her to Washington, and a large number of prominent citizens of Ohio are expected to form an escort for the new President. The Legislature will take a recess from Friday morning to the following Tuesday, and most of the Republican members of both houses will go on to the inauguration. The farewell reception to the Governor will take place to-morrow evening or Thursday morning in the Governor's room at the Capitol, members of the Legislature and citizens without distinction of party joining in the ovation.

Nothing has been disclosed by the incoming President as to the formation of his Cabinet, and speculation is left free scope. The impression is very general, however, here in Columbus, that Senator Sherman is to be Secretary of the Treasury, and the names of the candidates to succeed him in the Senate have been freely canvassed by the members of the Legislature for several days past. Congressmen Garfield and Shellabarger and Stanley Mathews are the three names generally mentioned in connection with the place, Garfield's being most prominent. The Republicans have 22 majority on joint ballot in the Legislature, and the unexpired term of Senator Sherman is two years.

The Committee of Arrangements for the farewell ovation to Gov. Hayes have invited the school children of the city and the inmates of the Deaf and Dumb and Blind Asylum to participate in the demonstration. The Governor will receive the children and the pupils of the asylum at 4 P. M. to-morrow, and the farewell reception of the citizens will take place in the evening in the Senate Chamber of the Capitol. Ex-Gov. Noyes arrived from Cincinnati this evening, and will accompany the President-elect to Washington.

BOUND TO DEFEAT THE COUNT.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF SPEAKER RANDALL TO A PERSONAL FRIEND—WE WILL FIGHT THE COMMISSION INCH BY INCH.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 27.—The filibustering action which the Democrats have been pursuing for some time past in the National House of Representatives regarding the count of the Electoral vote, has received authoritative support by the statement which Speaker Randall makes to a friend residing in Camden, immediately opposite this city. A few days ago Col. J. M. Scovill wrote to Mr. Randall asking him what course the Democrats would pursue in regard to the counting of the vote to-day. Col. Scovill received a written answer from the Speaker saying: "We intend to fight on this Electoral Commission inch by inch, and defeat the count at all hazards." Col. Scovill acknowledged to your correspondent that he received such a letter, but said that there was nothing in it about defeating the count. He, however, refused to produce the letter, saying that it was a personal one, and he could not betray confidence, adding that it was not worth while to say anything about it. This afternoon Col. Scovill made the statement as given above in the office of the West Jersey Press, in Camden, in the presence of Hon. Sinnickson Chew, editor of that paper, and Joseph L. Topham, ex-Clerk of the State Legislature, (both of whom the readers of THE TIMES know well by name,) and William Abels, Chairman of the Republican City Committee. He boasted of Randall's stand in the Electoral matter, and was glad the action of the tribunal was to be defeated at all hazards. Scovill is a defeated candidate for Mayor of Camden on the Democratic ticket, and is particularly bitter against his party just at present. While in a fit of anger he made the revelation concerning Randall's proposed course to defeat the will of the people. Scovill is a friend of Randall, and has been in Washington recently engineering some schemes for that individual.

THREATS OF BALTIMORE ROUGHS.

WAITING THE ARRIVAL OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT—THE KIND OF PERSONS WHOM GOV. HAYES MAY MEET—DISCOVERY OF A STARTLING PLOT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 27.—The Democratic Party and press of Baltimore are loud in their denunciation of the author and the denial of the report that Gov. Hayes is to be assassinated by Baltimore parties. It had been asserted some time since that a plot for that purpose had been laid in this city, but the idea was scouted by the Democratic leaders, and credited by those who knew the desperate character of many of the roughs who do the bidding of men thought to be honorable. The news that the Electoral Commission had given Louisiana to Hayes set these men nearly wild with disgust is a fact beyond doubt, and that they can be urged to the desperate deeds is also a fact that cannot be denied. The plot has been discovered. The crime may not be done, hence the Democratic press can still term it a "cock and bull story."

ABETTING THE CONSPIRACY.

DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS OF MEMBERS OF THE MICHIGAN LEGISLATURE — DISREGARD OF THE COMMISSION ADVISED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

DETROIT, Feb. 27.—The Democratic members of the State Legislature held a protracted caucus last night, which resulted in the adoption of the following, which was ordered to be telegraphed to Speaker Randall and Representative A. S. Williams:

Resolved, That having consented to the formation of the Electoral Commission, we counsel submission as violating every principle upon which it was established. We advise that no further countenance be given it by participating in its further action.

The minority favored a resolution calling upon the House to prevent the completion of the count, but they were finally out-voted two to one.

REVOLUTIONARY ADVICE BY THE CONNECTICUT DEMOCRATIC STATE COMMITTEE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

HARTFORD, Feb. 27.—The Democratic State Committee met here to-day and passed resolutions, in obedience to instructions from head-quarters, advising the Democrats in Congress to use all Constitutional means to prevent the election of Hayes under the decision of the Commission.

OBSTRUCTIONISTS IN THE PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 27.—The Democratic members of the Legislature, in caucus this morning, adopted a resolution requesting Representatives in Congress to use all legal means to prevent the inauguration of Mr. Hayes as President.

DISCONTENT WITH THE DELAY.

SENTIMENT AMONG BUSINESS MEN—COMMERCIAL INTERESTS SERIOUSLY AFFECTED—WHAT ANOTHER ELECTION WOULD PRODUCE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 27.—The Press to-morrow will contain important interviews with the leading business men of the city regarding the action of the House in delaying the count of the Electoral vote. The gentlemen whose opinions were obtained represent capital to the amount of $100,000,000, and upon them depend thousands of persons for support. With one accord they desired to see the matter settled, as it is paralyzing business and bringing on ruin. To quote the remark of Mr. A. J. Drexel, the broker, "I cannot use any words too emphatic to express my condemnation of the unscrupulous partisans who are engaged in the work of delaying the decision." Mr. William Cramp, of the great ship building firm, thought that the ordering of a new election would deal a blow at the commercial interests of the country, the result of which could be scarcely estimated. Among the gentlemen who accord in this opinion are Messrs. Amos R. Little, James C. Hand, Hon. Thomas Cochran, and Joel J. Bailey. The feeling is very strong.

At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Commercial Exchange, held this morning, S. E. Malone, President, in the chair, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Commercial Exchange of the City of Philadelphia, representing some 700 business firms, would respectfully represent to the Congress of the United States that the business interests of the whole country are hindered and disturbed by the delay in completing the count of the Presidential vote, and in the failure to pass the necessary appropriation bills for carrying on the Government, and that, without distinction of party, this Chamber protests against these failures, and urges that the peace, welfare, and prosperity of the whole people demand prompt action in these matters.

CONNECTICUT ELECTION LAWS.

THE NEW ACT BEFORE THE STATE LEGISLATURE—ITS MAIN PROVISIONS—RADICAL CHANGES REPORTED—DEMOCRATIC OPPOSITION EXPECTED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

HARTFORD, Feb. 27.—In the lower house of the State Legislature to-day, the proposed Election law was taken up and made the special order for Thursday morning. Its main provisions are: Application lists for new voters are to be closed 18 days before election, and no names can be added, except that it shall appear on the day of election that an old voter can have his name restored, when left off by clerical error, by consent of both Registers. Now the lists are kept open up to election day, and it is possible to get on names wrongfully, particularly by fraudulent certificates. The Selectmen cannot make new voters after the eighth day before election excepting those whose qualifications of age and residence mature within the last week, and they must be made on the day before election. A residence of one year in the State and six months in the town is necessary for registration now, but four months in a town is required, and a voter once a voter in the State may vote with such local residence of four months. The system of certificate voting is entirely abolished. Naturalization is conferred only by the Superior and Common Pleas Courts, and the applicant must go before the court in the county where he resides. Under the present law, City and Police courts may naturalize and hold evening sessions. In towns of over 7,000 inhabitants provision is made to prevent repeating. The Registers are to prepare checks and separate numbers for every name and residence, these checks to be signed by both Registers, who must appoint a deputy for each voting district, and these deputies are to be in session two days before election, and on election day to issue checks to electors, who must call for them in person and furnish identification when desired. Authority is given the Registers to issue duplicate checks when satisfied that the voter has lost his own, and it has not been voted on. Names when once checked on the lists cannot be voted a second time. All checks are to be preserved, with ballots, for six months after election. It is made a State Prison offense to forge a check, or to present one not belonging to the person offering it. Only two boxes are to be used at an election, one for Representatives and one for all other candidates, including State officers, Representatives in Congress, Presidential Electors, &c. All places where liquor is reported to be sold are to be closed on election day.

The check system has a good deal of machinery about it, but leading Republicans have approved it, and think the Legislature will pass it. Of course the Democrats will oppose it vigorously, and possibly some Republicans will think it is going a little beyond reason, but something is certainly necessary to put a stop to repeating in Connecticut. Another act which is to follow, provides for minority representation in boards of electmen, and gives either Register of Election power to require the applicant to be made an elector to read an entire article of the Constitution or a whole section of the statutes.

THE CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS AND DIRECTORS—THE COAL TRADE OF WESTERN MARYLAND—TWO RAILROAD PROJECTS BROUGHT FORWARD.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 27.—An important meeting of the stockholders, bondholders, and Directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company was held to-day, to consider measures for benefiting the interests of the canal and extending the coal trade of Western Maryland. Gov. John Lee Carroll presided, and the New-York interest was represented by Henry Loveridge, President of the Maryland Coal Company. The bonds and stocks of the canal are held in Maryland, District of Columbia, Virginia, and New-York. The tone of the meeting was in favor of building an independent railroad from Cumberland to Westernport as a feeder to the canal from the upper mines of Garrett County. Mr. Loveridge also presented the scheme of the Georges Creek and Cumberland Railroad to extend from Cumberland to Locanoning, and stated that New-York interests would embark heartily in it if the canal company would cooperate. At the bottom of the scheme is the competition between the canal and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad for the control of coal transportation to tide-water. The Consolidation Coal Company owns the only railroad between Cumberland and the mining region, and that company has lately passed virtually into the hands of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and will remove its offices from New-York to Baltimore. This cuts the canal off from a feeder from the mines, and it will probably accept the New-York offer for the building of one or more roads in whose management it will have a share. The proposition of Mr. Loveridge was favorably received, and will be reported to the next general meeting of the Canal Board. The two railroad projects are separate, but are parts of the general scheme to strengthen the canal in its war with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and restore to it the advantages of railway connection with the mines, of which it has been deprived. The mining corporations are generally ranging themselves on one side or the other, and their competition has had the temporary effect of stopping production altogether. They reduced miners' wages, and the latter struck. Both are holding out, and no coal is being mined. The capital necessary for building the coal roads mentioned would be about $600,000 for each.

AFFAIRS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE TILDA-NORRIS HABEAS CORPUS STILL UNDECIDED IN COLUMBIA.

COLUMBIA, Feb. 27.—The Supreme Court room was densely packed this morning in anticipation of a decision in the Tilda-Norris habeas corpus case. At 11 o'clock Justices Willard and Wright, the latter colored, came in, and the former announced the court would take a recess until 1 o'clock for consultation. The crowd then dispersed.

A strong guard of negro special constables are stationed across the hall in front of the Justices' consulting room. A deep but subdued excitement prevails. The Supreme Court room was thronged again at 1 o'clock, awaiting the decision. The Justices met in the consulting-room and remained there one hour, when they appeared on the bench and announced that they had been unable to agree on a decision, but might probably in a few days. The docket was then called and the crowd dispersed.

Askew, who has held the position of Assistant Postmaster for the past four years, have also been endeavoring to have that gentleman appointed to the position. It is rumored to-night that his nomination by the President has been sent to the Senate.

SUICIDE AT THE STEVENS HOUSE.

On the 5th inst. a young Englishman, giving his name as J. E. Dear, arrived from Liverpool and registered at the Stevens House, No. 29 Broadway. A room on the third floor of the hotel was assigned him and he remained a guest there since that time. He was not engaged in any business, but appeared to be well supplied with funds and spent his money very liberally. On Monday evening about 8 o'clock he entered the hotel, and asked the clerk for the key of the room, which was handed him, and he went up-stairs. This is the last time he was seen alive. Yesterday morning at 9 o'clock the chamber-maid went to the room occupied by Dear, and finding it locked rapped for admission, but received no response. She returned again at noon, and finding the door still locked, with the key inside, she became alarmed, and informed Mr. Allen, the proprietor of the hotel. The door of the room was forced open, and Dear was found lying dead on the floor with his throat cut, and a razor still clasped in his hand. He had been dead for some hours when found. Coroner Croker held an inquest in the case, and a verdict of suicide was rendered. Mr. Allen sent word to Gorman & Co., of No. 7 Wall-street, with whom the deceased had some financial relations, and the firm took charge of the remains and had them removed to an undertaker's establishment in Greenwich-street. The funeral of the deceased will take place to-day, and the remains will be interred in Green-Wood Cemetery. The proprietor of the hotel failed to make known the facts to the Police, and was very anxious to keep the suicide from the newspapers. The motive for the suicide could not be learned.

THE ELECTORAL TRIBUNAL.

SOUTH CAROLINA FOR HAYES.

DEMOCRATIC LAWYERS AND COMMISSIONERS TALKING TO CONSUME TIME—NO ARGUMENTS ON THE REPUBLICAN SIDE EXCEPT BY THE OBJECTOR, MR. LAWRENCE—THE DEMOCRATIC COMMISSIONERS EVIDENTLY COGNIZANT OF THE ACTION OF THE HOUSE—THE DISPOSITION TO TALK LESS MANIFEST AFTER THE ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—The Electoral Commission adjourned to-night at 7:30, having completed all the work that is expected to fall to it in the counting of the Electoral vote. Again, the decision was by a majority of 8 to 7, the Democratic Commissioners voting together not to count any Electoral votes from the State of South Carolina, though the majority of Hayes is unchallenged in that State, and the Democratic Committee of the House reported that he was undoubtedly elected. Judge Abbott, one of the Commissioners, was a member of the committee that made the report. The ground upon which the seven Democrats sustained their partisan vote was chiefly that the presence of the military in the State overawed the citizens and prevented the election from being fair and legal. An incidental objection, which was sustained with considerable argument in the Commission, was the failure of the Hayes Electors to certify that they voted by ballot; but it was found on an examination of the statute that this statement is not required in the certificates, which conformed exactly to the law. On the resolution that the Tilden votes were not the lawful and constitutional votes of the State the Commission was unanimous; but there can be no credit claimed by the Democrats for this vote, since the counsel and the objectors and the entire body of the Democratic Party are forced to admit that the Hayes Electors had a majority of votes. This resolution was merely formal, and was not an expression of any opinion on the merits of the South Carolina case which were embodied in the resolution on counting the Hayes Electors.

The Commission, after the conclusion of the arguments, assembled at 1:45 o'clock to consider its decision. At that time a suggestion was made that very little argument would be necessary, but Mr. Hunton rose and spoke for an hour. About 15 minutes of his speech was taken up by reading the Democratic proffer of evidence which had already been twice read in the hearing of the Commission within a couple of hours. Then he did not read it for the purpose of comment, but evidently to extend the time of his speech as much as possible. It was supposed that when Mr. Hunton concluded a vote might be taken, but Judge Abbott took the floor and spoke for about three-

Electors, which being excluded would give the majority to the Tilden Electors.

Second—That immediately after the adjournment of Congress, to wit, on the month of August, 1876, a large number of United States soldiers under the command of Gen. Ruger were sent by the President into said State; that on Oct. 16 Gen. Ruger telegraphed to the authorities at Washington that all was quiet, that there was no need for further troops, that if he deemed a further force necessary he would so inform them; that he never did call for more troops, and that on Oct 17 the President issued a proclamation declaring that the people of said State were in a condition of insurrection, and that immediately thereafter large numbers of United States soldiers were sent into said State; that at no time prior to the last-mentioned date was there a condition of violence or insurrection which the authorities of the State were unable to control; that at no time during the year 1876 did such a state of affairs exist in South Carolina as justified the intervention of the Federal Government.

Third—That troops were sent into said State without any action in the Legislature thereof, although the same could have been readily convened.

Fourth—That the troops were sent into said State, not for the purpose of quelling insurrection, of preserving peace and good order; but for the purpose, and with the design of overawing the voters of said State; that troops were stationed at or near the polls on election day, and that their presence, before and at the day of election, did put obstruct and interfere with the expression of the popular will and prevent a free election.

Fifth—That the presence of said troops served to embolden the more desperate, negroes being assured by the party leaders that said troops were there for the purpose of protecting them in any act of violence. That the blacks throughout the Counties of Buford and Charleston inaugurated a condition of riot and lawlessness; that public officials incited them to the commission of every character of crime; that murder was committed and the perpetrators were allowed to escape punishment; that Justices refused to issue warrants of arrest for criminals charged even with the crime of murder, and Sheriffs refused to execute said warrants if issued; that the Police force of the City of Charleston, composed almost entirely of Republicans, engaged in shooting down upon the public streets quiet and inoffensive white men, many of them being leaders in the riots which occurred; that upon election day the negroes assembled at the polls, and with rifles, shot-guns, and other weapons prevented negroes who wished to do so from voting the Democratic ticket; that the State Militia, composed of the worst elements of the negro population, supplied with State arms, was also at the polls aiding and abetting in the violation of law and in the intimidation of voters; that the Sheriff of Charleston County, one of the Republican Electors, without warrant or authority of law, appointed hundreds of so-called Deputy Sheriffs—all negroes and Republicans—investing them with the power to make arrests at their pleasure; that these Deputy Sheriffs swarmed about the various polls on election day, and their threats and violence did hinder and prevent many citizens from voting, and did arrest and imprison without warrant many of those who attempted to vote the Democratic ticket; that persons styled United States Deputy Marshals were also stationed at the polls and by assisting such Deputy Sheriffs; that throughout the State the negroes believed the United States soldiers had been sent to shoot them if they did not vote the Republican ticket.

Sixth—That such violence and lawlessness existed throughout the Counties of Charleston and Buford shortly before and on the day of the election, which said lawlessness was primarily attributed to the occupation of the said State by United States soldiers; that no free election could be or was held in said counties; that on the contrary the popular will found no expression at the polls; that by reason of the lawlessness which existed in the County of Charleston alone the Republican Electors secured a majority of about 7,000 votes.

In that connection the SPEAKER called attention to volume 3, section 2,519, Lincoln, page 173.

THE REPUBLICAN OBJECTION.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, followed Mr. Hurd, and stated his objections to certificate No. 2. He first directed the attention of the Commission to the papers purporting to be certificates of the Electoral votes cast for Tilden and Hendricks by Theodore J. Barker and others, claiming to be Electors for South Carolina. To these he objected.

First—Because they were here without the certificate required by sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Those sections required that there should be a list of the names certified by the Executive of the State.

Second—Because they were here without the certificate required by the statute of South Carolina, according to chapter 9 of the Revised Statutes of South Carolina, No. 3, section 15.

Commissioner ABBOTT said that if that the other side made no objection, as he understood, to the certificate, and there was no use in arguing it.

Judge Lawrence accordingly gave up that portion of his argument, and proceeded to inquire as to the legal appointment of the Hayes Electors. From the evidence to which he had already referred it was sufficiently shown, he thought, that they were duly appointed Electors, and that theirs were the votes provided by the Constitution to be counted, unless some of the objections made to them should be well taken. The speaker very briefly considered these objections, saying in regard to the first objection that the clause of the Constitution as to registration was directory, and the failure to comply with it could not affect the result. Such a provision, he said, in a State Constitution could not take from the State Legislature the power given to it by the Constitution of the United States to provide for the appointment of Electors without registration in such manner as the Legislature might direct; and, finally, that the Legislature had complied with the constitutional provision requiring registration. He read the statute relating to registration in South Carolina in the light of authority and reason. The failure to enact a registration law could not affect the authority of the Electors. He answered the second objection by saying that the State Constitution could not take from the Legislature the right given to it by the Constitution of the United States to appoint Electors without the registration of voters in such a manner as the Legislature might direct. In other words, if the State Constitution required the State to enact a law for the registration of Electors it was unconstitutional. The Constitution of the United States provided that each State should appoint Electors in such manner as the Legislature thereof might direct.

Commissioner Abbott asked if he meant to say that it was unconstitutional that the State Constitution should provide that elections should take place by election laws.

Mr. Lawrence replied: Yes; I meant to say that the matter of appointment of Electors for President and Vice President of the United States is, by the Constitution of the United States, intrusted solely to the discretion of the State Legislature, and is absolutely uncontrolable by any provision of the State Constitution. The State Legislature was made the exclusive judge of the manner in which the popular elections should be authorized, regulated, and the result declared, subject only to the amendments of the Constitution in relation to suffrage, and such regulations as Congress might from time to time provide. The State Constitution could not require a registration law. In the third place, he proceeded to show that the Legislature had complied with the constitutional provision requiring registration, and he quoted the election law as to each voting precinct and the Revised Statutes also. Now, the second objection was that the State of South Carolina during the year 1876 did not have a republican form of government. It was a sufficient answer to say that South Carolina was duly represented in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States during all this time, and this was conclusive evidence in every particular against the objection that had been made. The third objection was answered by the speaker, by saying that there was no proof to support this objection. Still more, it was not the function of this tribunal to hear evidence in support of it or to make the inquiry. This was decided in principle by the determination of this Commission as to the Florida Electors. But, if the Commission could make the inquiry, still the Government of the United States has authority to place troops in South Carolina, and, when placed, it must be presumed to have been properly done, on sufficient authority, and for sufficient reasons. In regard to the fourth objection made, the speaker said it was a sufficient answer to say that it was unsupported by evidence; it was not competent to receive proof in support of the legal presumption was that the Deputy United States Marshals did their duty properly. If proof were, however, offered it could undoubtedly be shown that they did not interfere with the suffrage, but as no such evidence was competent, no question of the law arises. As to the first and second objection, he said it was also unsupported by evidence, and entirely unfounded in fact; was contradicted by the truth of history, and was overthrown by the same authority he had already cited in the case of Luther against Borden.

At the close of Mr. Lawrence's argument, Mr. Justice Clifford inquired if there were any other counsel to argue objections.

Mr. Lawrence replied "No," as Senator Christiancy waived his right to argue.

MR. BLAIR'S ARGUMENT.

The counsel were then invited to proceed, and Montgomery Blair opened the case as the counsel for the objectors on the Democratic side. Mr. Blair offered to prove that owing to the intimidation and violence, &c., there was no free election. The evidence supported completely objections three and four, and the first ground of his objection to counting certificate No. 1 was that there was no registration of Electors as provided by the law He should proceed to notice the argument on the other side—that by the Constitution of the United States the power of directing the mode of making the elections or the appointment of Electors is vested in the Legislature of the State, and that any proposition interfering with the discretion of that body was a violation of the Constitution of the United States. He believed the case of certificate No. 1 rested entirely on that proposition. The Registration law was not a time nor a manner, and there was no provision in the Constitution of the United States at all directing that the Legislature of the State should be paramount to the Constitution of that State by which it was created. The intention of the Constitution of the United States was simply to make use of the agencies of the State, undoubtedly for the purpose of appointing an Elector. The Legislature of the State is an agency of the United States, but it was an agency created by the State of which it was a co-ordinate department of the Government, and of course it must exercise its agency for the United States in accordance with the power which creates and makes it. The counsel took up the objection in regard to the violation of the rights of the people of this State by the incursion of the military power into the State for the purpose of controlling affairs of that State, by the military power of the United States. It seemed to him an all sufficient ground to throw aside and defeat this vote.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT asked Mr. Blair: Do you find any case where the national power over the mandate of the Constitution requiring a registry has been sufficient to defeat an election?

Mr. Blair—There is not a case to be found in the books where the constitutional requirement of a registry has ever been denied, except in the case of South Carolina.

THE REPUBLICANS SUBMIT THE CASE WITHOUT ARGUMENT.

At the conclusion of Mr. Blair's argument, Mr. Justice Clifford invited counsel on the Republican side to follow. Mr. Mathews and Mr. Shellabarger conferred together an instant, and then

Mr. Shellabarger said—The counsel have decided, in view of the shortness of the time remaining in which to make the count, that they will submit the case without argument.

Mr. Justice Clifford inquired if the other side cared to make any further argument.

Mr. Cochrane replied that Judge Black would address the Commission.

MR. BLACK'S ARGUMENT.

Judge Black began as follows: I had no intention of arguing the case; did not know what the objections were and never heard them. It would be the highest presumption in me to attempt to argue upon such a case as this is, having no previous opportunity of considering it which would put me in a condition better than the Judges are in themselves. My idea of the duty which counsel owes a court, or any other tribunal, is that he should never open his mouth except for the purpose of assisting the Judges in coming to a correct conclusion, and if he is not in a condition to do that he ought to keep his seat. Besides that, I am, I suppose, the very last man in this whole nation that ought to be called upon to speak here and now. Everybody has suffered more or less by the war which is past and gone, but I am more than ordinarily conscious that I have lost the dignity of an American citizen, and that this nation, to which I was proud to belong, has got her foot in a trap from which she cannot release herself. If it were possible that going out on a forlorn hope would have the least effect in making this wrong of a less long life, I would gladly go out, and I do not know how I might feel if I were called upon to give my life for the safety of the country. But I ought to be willing, if I could redeem this nation from the infamy with which she is clothed from head to foot, to lay down my life and go to my grave in her cause freely. However, I do not know that anything can save us. We have certain objections that look to me in this case perfectly insuperable to the counting of this vote, perfectly clear and right, but I cannot hope that they will bear that appearance in other men's eyes. I tell you that the state of feeling to which I, in common with millions of others, have been wrought up, perhaps prevents me from seeing this thing in its true light. On my own cool, you are wise, you look upon this business as being no injury to the country. You think, on the contrary, that the sanctification of that fraud is of slight interest to the nation; that when that is crowned and made omnipotent we will all be better off than if the truth had prevailed and justice had triumphed. Now, turning your cool consideration to this subject for a moment, see whether it is possible for you to say whether this is just right, according to the law of the land—according to the law of the land as it was before the creation of this Commission. He then proceeded to argue against the legality of the election in South Carolina, and, continuing, said: Now, that is the law; of course, we may struggle for justice and cry for mercy; we may go down on our knees and beg and woo for some little recognition of our rights as American citizens, but we might as well put up our prayers to Jupiter, and Mars, and Apollo. There is not a god in Olympus that would not listen to us with more favor than we would be listened to by [here the speaker, with uplifted finger, hesitated, turned slowly around, and directing his gaze away from the members of the Commission to the Republican counsel; the gentlemen on the other side. [Great laughter, instantly checked by the Presiding Justice.] It is only to them that we can appeal, because you, gentlemen, [turning again to the Bench,] unfortunately cannot help us. Of course, you are afflicted, like all other people, with the vice of consistency. Now, you have said that where in any case of a State the record was offered to be laid before your eyes, and that before you had nothing to do but look at it, showing that certain persons were not only not appointed but rejected, and where certain other persons were appointed and the appointing power had recorded its act, that that was not the question, not who were duly appointed, but who certain parties who committed a most foul crime forging returns and falsifying the record said were appointed. That was the only question you said for you to consider. Now, then, why should we talk about it any further? What is the use of going behind the returns to show irregularity if we cannot show who were appointed? So sacred is what is called a return, according to law, mind you, that you must pronounce a vote cast by a man that the Constitution of the United States expressly declares shall not have the power of counting the vote a good vote—that is, it is according to the Constitution after it is done, although it is known to be in the very teeth of the Constitution. Now you see why we are hopeless and why we feel badly. The question whether these men were authorized to cast a vote or not, or whether they are bogus Electors, is a thing to be inquired into always and everywhere. The speaker then proceeded to argue that Congress should examine and verify the certificates, and after a comparison with the proposed Turkish reforms, concluded as follows: But this thing being established, this omnipotent fraud being sustained by the public authorities of the nation and removed entirely beyond our reach of redress it is as a matter of course an invitation to everybody to do the same thing hereafter. I don't expect to see an honest election again. I shall only want to know hereafter what sort of scoundrels they have got for a Returning Board. I think there never was a set of gentlemen who had a better right to rejoice over another. Well may you say, "We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at an agreement." Under falsehood have we hid ourselves." But, nevertheless, wait a little while. The waters of truth will rise gradually, but surely, and then look out for the overflowing scourge. The refuge of lies shall be swept away, and the hiding-place of falsehood shall be uncovered. Some day, or another this mighty nation will rouse herself up. Bide your time. The mill of God grinds slowly, but it grinds dreadful fine, and we will let the water on before a very great while.

ACTION OF THE COMMISSION.

The Commission then went into secret session, and the room was cleared of spectators. The Commission remained in secret session from 1:45 to 7 P. M. After the discussion had continued three and a half hours, Mr. Edmunds submitted a motion that voting should commence at 6 o'clock. This motion was agreed to—Yeas 8, nays 7. After 6 P. M. propositions were offered and voted on as follows:

Mr. Morton then submitted the following:

That it is not competent for the two houses, assembled for the purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice President, to inquire by evidence whether a State regularly represented in the two houses of Congress and recognized as a State of the United States by the other departments of the Government, has a Government republican in form.

Resolved, That while the existence of public disturbance and anarchy in any State, to such an extent as to make it impossible for the State to exercise its rights to appoint electors of President and Vice President, and to express its will in that behalf, is sufficient cause for rejecting such electoral votes purporting to be the votes of electors appointed thereby; yet that when a State is regularly represented as a State in the Congress of the United States, and is recognized as a State by the other departments of the Government, and has a Government republican in form, and does appoint Electors in the manner prescribed by the Legislature thereof, evidence cannot be received by the two houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice President, as aforesaid, to show that disturbances existed at the time of the election, which may have interfered to a greater or less extent with the freedom of election at the polls in said State.

Resolved, That it is not competent for the two houses of Congress, when assembled to count the votes for President and Vice President, by taking evidence, to determine the regularity of the action of the President of the United States in sending a military force into any State for the preservation of order or the suppression of insurrection and domestic violence, in order by such power to lay a ground for rejecting the Electoral vote of said State.

Resolved, That in view of the propositions contained in the three foregoing resolutions, the evidence off red to show that the State of South Carolina in the late election did not have a republican form of government, and the evidence offered on the subject of disorder and violence and the presence of troops in said State during said section, is not competent, but that, notwithstanding the offer of such evidence, the Electoral votes of the State of South Carolina ought to be received and counted, if not objectionable on other grounds.

Resolved, That the other objections to certificate No. 1 show no valid cause for rejecting the same.

Adopted.

Mr. FIELD offered the following substitutes:

Resolved, That evidence is admissible to show that prior to and during the election of the 7th day of November, 1876, in the cities of South Carolina, there were military stationed in various parts of the State, at or near the polling places, detachments of troops of the army of the United States, by whose presence and interference qualified voters of the State were deprived of the right of suffrage, and a free choice by the people of the Presidential Electors was prevented.

Resolved, That evidence is inadmissible to show that the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, in South Carolina there were stationed at the several polling-places in the State deputy Marshals of the United States, exceeding 1,000 in number, by whose unlawful action and interference, under orders from the Department of Justice, qualified voters of the State were deprived of the right of suffrage and a free choice by the people of Presidential Electors was prevented.

These substitutes were rejected.

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Kernan, and Payne—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

The question recurring on the adoption of Mr. Morton's resolutions, they were adopted—yeas 8, nays 7—the above vote being reversed.

Mr. Frelinghuysen offered the following:

Resolved, That Theodore R. Barker, S. McGowan, John W. Harrington, John Isaac Ingraham, William Wallace, John B. Erwin, and Robert Aldrich, the persons named as electors in certificate No. 2, were not the lawful Electors for the State of South Carolina, and that their votes are not the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and should not be counted.

This was adopted unanimously.

Mr. Morton offered the following:

Resolved, That C. C. Bowan, J. Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, W. B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and W. F. Myers, the persons named as Electors in certificate No. 1, were the lawful Electors for the State of South Carolina, and that their votes are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and should be counted for President and Vice President of the United States.

Adopted by yeas 8, nays 7, the same as the vote on Mr. Morton's previous resolution.

A report is to be presented to the two houses giving the grounds on which the Commission had reached its decision. Mr. Morton offered the following:

Resolved, That the thanks of this Commission are due to Commissioner Clifford for the ability, impartiality, and urbanity with which he has presided over its deliberations.

Adopted unanimously.

A resolution offered by Mr. Strong was adopted, authorizing the members of the Commission to file the remarks made by them during the consultations of the Commission, and have the same published with the proceedings of the Commission. A resolution removing the injunction of secrecy was also adopted.

On motion of Mr. Garfield, at 6:54 P. M. the Commission adjourned until 11 o'clock Friday morning, March 2, unless sooner called together by its presiding officer.

THE COMMISSION'S REPORT.

The report of the Commission is in substance as follows:

The Electoral Commission, having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates and papers accompanying the same of the Electoral vote from the State of South Carolina, and the objections thereto, reports that it has duly considered the same, and has by a majority of votes decided and does hereby decide that the votes of C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, W. B. Nash, William Cook, and William F. Meyers, named in the certificate of Gov. Chamberlain, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificates submitted to the Commission as aforesaid and hereinafter referred to, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely seven votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and seven votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New-York, for Vice President. The Commission, by a majority of votes, decide and declare that the seven persons first before named were duly appointed Electors in and for the said State of South Carolina. The chief ground of this decision is that it appears upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law creating this Commission is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject; that the before mentioned Electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such Electors of President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1877, of the State of South Carolina, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law; and the Commission has, by a majority of votes, decided that it is not competent under the Constitution and the law to go into evidence aliunde, the papers opened by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the Governor of the State, on and according to the determination of the appointment by the Returning officers for elections in said State, prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed Electors, or by counter proof to show that they had not, or that the determination of the said Returning Officers was not in accordance with the truth and fact, the Commission by a majority of votes being of the opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice President, to enter upon a trial of such questions.

The report will also set forth the fact that the votes of the Democratic Electors of South Carolina were rejected by a unanimous vote of the Commission.

The Secretary of the Commission will to-morrow morning deliver to the President pro tem. of the Senate the formal decision above described, together with all the certificates and accompanying papers in the case which had been referred to the Commission; and the Secretary will also deliver to the Speaker of the House a formal notification, signed by the President of the Commission, that their decision had been communicated to the President pro tem.

REPORT ON CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

A THOROUGH INVESTIGATION MADE—130 WITNESSES EXAMINED—THE VIEWS OF ALL CLASSES HEARD—THE EFFECTS OF CHEAP LABOR—NO DESIRE FOR PROGRESS ON THE PART OF THE MONGOLIAN RACE—IMMORALITY UNMENTIONABLE—A STARTLING ARRAY OF FACTS.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—The report of the Joint Special Committee to investigate Chinese immigration, after referring to the resolutions creating it, says: In conducting the investigation required by the resolutions the Joint Committee visited the Pacific coast and examined 130 witnesses. In conducting this examination the committee divided their work so as to first hear persons opposed to the unlimited introduction of Chinese, and to this branch of the subject a limited time was given. They then heard the testimony of persons favorable to such introduction, and concluded by affording time for witnesses in rebuttal. In the opinion of the committee it may be said that the resources of California and the Pacific coast have been more rapidly developed with the cheap and docile labor of Chinese than they would have been without this element. So far as material prosperity is concerned, it cannot be doubted that the Pacific coast has been a great gainer. This is true, at any rate, of the capitalist classes. If the inquiry should stop there, if it should be satisfied by the certainty that money is made out of the present condition of things, and not look to the present or future moral or political welfare of our Pacific States, it must be conceded, at least, that many enterprising men find their profit in Chinese immigration, and the general resources of the Pacific are being rapidly developed by means of Chinese labor.

The committee found that laboring men and artisans, perhaps without exception, were opposed to the influx of Chinese, on the ground that hard experience had shown that they are thereby thrown out of employment, and the means of decent livelihood are more difficult of acquisition. But the opposition to Chinese immigration was not confined to laboring men and mechanics. In the testimony will be found that of lawyers, doctors, merchants, divines, Judges, and others in large numbers, speaking of their own observation and belief, that the apparent prosperity derived from the presence of Chinese is deceptive and unwholesome, ruinous to our laboring classes, promotive of caste, and dangerous to free institutions. In the progress of their investigation the committee called before them the Municipal authorities of San Francisco, including the Executive, Legislative, Health, and Police Departments, to ascertain the numbers, habits, and modes of life of the Chinese in San Francisco. The number of adult Chinese residents in that city averages at present, during a year, about 35,000. The testimony shows that the Chinese live in filthy dwellings, upon poor food, crowded together in narrow quarters, disregarding health and fire ordinances, and that their vices are corrupting to the morals of the city, especially of the young.

Among the testimony will be found that of some 20 operatives, numbering nearly as many trades, in which details are given in relation to different industrial pursuits which are either monopolized by the Chinese, or are fast becoming so. This evidence shows that the Chinese have reduced wages to what would be starvation prices for white men and women, and engrossed so much of the labor in the various callings that there is a lack of employment for whites; and young men are growing up in idleness, while young women willing to work are compelled to resort to doubtful means of support. The hardships resulting from these causes bear with especial weight upon women.

As the safety of republican institutions requires that the exercise of the franchise shall be only by those who have a love and appreciation of our institutions, and this rule excludes the great mass of the Chinese from the ballot as a necessary means to public safety, yet the application of the rule deprives them of the only adequate protection which any class in a republic for its security of any distinctive large class of persons. An indigestible mass in the community, distinct in language, pagan in religion, inferior in mental and moral qualities and all peculiarities, is an undesirable element in a republic, but becomes especially so if political power is placed in its hands. The safety of the State demands that such power shall not be so placed. The safety of the class, however, seems to depend in a measure upon that power. To any one reading the testimony which we lay before the two houses it will become painfully evident that the Pacific coast must in time become either American or Mongolian.

Upon the point of morals there is no Aryan or European race which is not far superior to the Chinese as a class. There is no intermarriage between the Asiatics and the Caucasian race. The presence of the Chinese discourages and retards white immigration to the Pacific States. It is very clearly in evidence that the number of the Chinese on the Pacific coast is rapidly increasing, not by births, for there are few of these, but by importations, so that the same uneducated class is supplied perpetually. The Chinese do not come to make their home in this country; their only purpose is to acquire what would be a competence in China and return there to enjoy it. It further appears from the evidence that the Chinese do not desire to become citizens of this country, and have no knowledge of, or appreciation for, our institutions. Very few of them learn to speak our language. They do not desire the ballot, and there is danger if they had it their "head men" would control the sale of it in quantities large enough to determine any election. That it would be destructive to the Pacific States to put the ballot in their hands was very generally believed by the witnesses. The tide of Chinese immigration is gradually tending eastward, and before a quarter of a century the difficult question that now arises upon the Pacific coast will probably have to be met upon the banks of the Mississippi, and perhaps on the Ohio and Hudson. Many people of the Pacific coast believe that this influx of Chinese is a standing menace to republican institutions upon the Pacific, and the existence there of Christian civilization. From all the facts that they have gathered bearing upon the matter, and considering fairly the testimony for and against the Chinese, the committee believes that this opinion is well founded. They believe that free institutions, founded upon free schools and intelligence, can only be maintained where based on intelligent and adequately-paid labor. Chinese emigration involves sordid wages, no public schools, and the absence of the family. We speak of the Chinese as they have exhibited themselves on the Pacific coast for 25 years past, and as they are there at the present time. They show few of the characteristics of a desirable population, and many to be deprecated by any patriot.

This problem is too important to be treated with indifference. Congress should solve it, having due regard to any rights already accrued under existing treaties and to humanity. But it must be solved in the judgment of the committee, unless our Pacific possessions are to be ultimately given over to a race alien in all its tendencies, which will make of it practically provinces of China rather than States of the Union.

The committee recommend that measures be taken by the Executive looking toward a modification of the existing treaty with China, confining it to strictly commercial purposes, and that Congress legislate to restrain the great influx of Asiatics to this country. It is not believed that either of these measures would be looked upon with disfavor by the Chinese Government. Whether this is so or not, a duty is owing to the Pacific States and Territories which are suffering under a terrible scourge, but are patiently waiting for relief from Congress.

THROAT AND CHEST DISEASES.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE TRUSTEES OF THE NEW-YORK DISPENSARY—REPORTS ON THE WORK ACCOMPLISHED SINCE THE FORMATION OF THE INSTITUTION—DR. RUPPANER RE-ELECTED PHYSICIAN IN CHIEF, TOGETHER WITH MOST OF THE OLD OFFICERS.

The Board of Trustees of the New-York Dispensary for Diseases of the Throat and Chest held their annual meeting at the residence of the President, Mr. Rush C. Hawkins, No. 16 West Twenty-third-street, on Monday evening. The old Board of Trustees were re-elected, with the exception of J. H. Sherwood, whose place was filled by the election of Mr. John B. Pannes, the law partner of Col. Hawkins, and the latter gentleman was re-elected President and Treasurer. Other officers were elected as follows: John R. Flanagan, Vice President; John B. Pannes, Secretary, in place of Dr. C. E. Beebe, whose resignation as Secretary and Assistant Physician was accepted; A. Ruppaner, M. D., Physician in Chief, who had tendered his resignation to the Board of Trustees after seven years of continuous service, consented to withdraw the same, and will continue at the head of the institution for the present.

The seventh annual report of the Board of Trustees was presented and read. It gives a summary of the work accomplished since the foundation of the institution. The total number of patients treated during the seven years ending Dec. 31, 1876, was 8,467, and about 9,000 prescriptions were written, in many cases medicines being furnished gratuitously. The treatment of each patient cost about $2 12. The only items of expense are rent, gas, coal, medicines, salary of janitor, instruments, and repairs, the janitor being the only person connected with the institution who has ever drawn any pay. A large proportion of the cases treated were chronic, the majority of which have been permanently cured. The patients have been mostly poor, working men and women, some of whom were once in better circumstances and able to employ their own medical adviser. The Trustees allude to the constantly increasing number of applicants, and the necessity for a well appointed hospital for the exclusive treatment of throat, chest, and lung diseases. They state that New-York is far behind several other cities in this respect, London being particularly favored in the possession of at least two institutions of this character. The expenses of a hospital with 25 beds, and a dispensary attached, would be only about $10,000 a year, and the Trustees express the hope that in the near future some compassionate philanthropist will endow an institution of this kind. In conclusion the report pays a well-deserved tribute to the Physician in Chief of the Dispensary, as it says: "Dr. Austen Ruppaner, whose efforts contributed largely toward the establishment of this, the first, and, for a long time, the only special institution for the treatment of diseases of the throat and chest in New-York City, and who has labored so assiduously to make it a useful success, for his seven years of laborious and strictly gratuitous service as Physician in Chief, entitled to the respect and gratitude of the public."

Dr. Ruppaner, in his report to the Board of Trustees after reviewing the work of the dispensary since its foundation, gives the results accomplished each year, as follows: The number of cases of throat diseases treated was 904; chest diseases, 69; 1871, throat diseases, 312; chest diseases, 122; 1872, throat diseases, 443; chest diseases, 180; 1873, throat diseases, 548; chest diseases, 236; 1874, throat diseases, 1,377; chest diseases, 563; 1875, throat diseases, 1,355; chest diseases 593; 1876, throat diseases, 1,588; chest diseases 723; total number of patients treated in seven years, 8,467, of whom 5,985 were treated for throat diseases, and 2,482 for diseases of the chest. The number of examinations and consultations in these cases was 33,868. When it is considered that in throat cases each consultation implies an examination, and that in pulmonary or cardiac complaints an examination of the chest, an idea can be formed of the large amount of gratuitous labor performed by the physicians. The maximum attendance of patients per day has been 49, and the minimum attendance 3. The number of males treated was 4,466; women, 3,728; children, 273. Over 33,000 prescriptions were furnished gratis.

In concluding his report, Dr. Ruppaner remarks that by far the largest number of patients suffer from the catarrhal diseases incident to our severe, changeable climate, and from pulmonary diseases, either induced by the latter causes, such as colds, exposure to moist and low temperature, living in damp and badly ventilated apartments, &c., or, as is still oftener the case, the pulmonary affections are directly traceable to overwork, deficient food, and total neglect of all the sanitary laws in so far as these are applicable by individuals to themselves. Pulmonary consumption, in all its stages, is the disease which, in a City like this, is most frequent. The great difficulty met with invariably, in whatever stage of the disease, or at whatever age the patients may present themselves, is that, however judiciously the treatment may be planned and adopted, the want of proper food, sufficient clothing, and the forced duty of going to regular work, either for personal support or for those dependent upon the immediate results of that labor for daily support, counteract too often almost all, if not every effort to relieve permanently—it such were possible—or at least temporarily, a large class of sufferers. The question may be asked: Why not these patients seek the dispensary? The impossibility of doing this is found in the fact that hospitals are maintained for the admission of acute cases only; chronic cases are the exceptions. Being refused admission to the hospitals, the sufferer, if very poor, turns to the special dispensary for relief, which by the better class of patients, in reduced circumstances, is sought out first in preference to the hospitals. Frequently these unfortunates are sent to the dispensary, not so much because special attention is given to throat and chest diseases by the attendants, but because the patient's means have become exhausted. The Doctor argues from these facts that a hospital for the exclusive treatment of throat and chest diseases should be established.

The following officers were in charge of the institution last year: President and Treasurer, Col. Rush C. Hawkins; Vice President, John R. Flanagan; Secretary, Clarence E. Beebe, M. D. Trustees—Col. Rush C. Hawkins, Hon. John K. Porter, Hon. G. F. Comstock, John R. Flanagan, William Moller, William J. Beebe, Hon. Oswald Ottendorfer, D. M. Hildreth, William B. Dinsmore, Edward A. Hammond, Antoine Ruppaner, M. D., Hon. Thomas L. James, Jacob Windmuller, Frederick Kane, William H. Webb, N. Chandler, Constant Andrews; Hon. S. S. Cox, J. H. Sherwood, William Graydon. Medical officers—Dr. A. Ruppaner, Physician in Chief; Dr. Clarence E. Beebe, Assistant Physician; Dr. G. Ceccarini, Consulting Physician.

MR. KINZEY'S MARITAL TROUBLES.

A suit has been begun by Mr. William Kinsey, in the Court of Common Pleas, to procure judgment as to the validity of his marriage to the lady who now calls herself Mrs. Kinzey. The facts upon which the suit are based are that the lady was in early life the wife a man named Willard Ide. He left her and she had no communication with him for more than eight years, at the end of which period she was espoused by Mr. Kinzey. Her first husband was then and still is living; but several weeks after she became Mrs. Kinzey she procured letters of separation from him. The law of this State provides that a woman may contract a second marriage if her husband has been away from her for five years, and if she has used proper diligence to discover his whereabouts and failed. The law adds, however, that such second marriage may be set aside by the Supreme Court. Mr. Kinzey is now paying Mrs. Kinzey, or, as he calls her, Mrs. Ide, $20 per week, under an order from Justice Bixby, in a suit for abandonment begun against him several weeks ago. His counsel in the Police Court case was Mr. W. J. Butler. Within a few days he has withdrawn from that lawyer, and yesterday Judge Robinson, sitting in the Court of Common Pleas, issued an order enjoining Mr. Henry Daily as counsel. Before the trial of the suit on the marriage in the Court of Common Pleas, Mr. Townsend, Mrs. Kinzey's lawyer, intends to make a motion for an allowance of alimony to his client.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.....Feb. 27.

SENATE.

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock.

Messrs. West, Hamlin, and Bogy were appointed members of the Conference Committee on the Post Office Appropriation bill.

THE LATE SPEAKER KERR.

Mr. MCDONALD, of Indiana, called up the resolution of the House of Representatives in respect to the memory of the late Speaker Kerr.

Appropriate remarks upon the life and character of the deceased were made by Messrs. McDonald, of Indiana; Wallace, of Pennsylvania; Wright, of Iowa; Bayard, of Delaware; Booth, of California, and Morton, of Indiana, after which the resolutions of the House were unanimously agreed to.

At 12 o'clock the journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

THE INAUGURATION BALL.

Mr. CONOVER, of Florida, presented a petition of leading citizens of Washington, asking permission to use the rotunda at the Capitol for the purpose of holding the inauguration ball therein. Referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM GRASSHOPPERS.

Mr. WINDOM, of Minnesota, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported favorably on the Senate bill for the relief of settlers on public lands. Passed. (It authorizes homestead and pre-emption settlers whose crops were destroyed by grasshoppers in 1876 to leave and be absent from their lands until 1878.)

THE FRENCH STATUE OF LIBERTY.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably on the House joint resolution authorizing the President to designate and set apart a site for the colossal statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," and provide for the permanent maintenance and preservation thereof. Passed. (It authorizes the President of the United States to accept the colossal statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," when presented by citizens of the French Republic, and to set apart for the erection thereof a suitable site upon either Governor's or Bedloe's Island, New-York harbor, and upon the completion thereof shall cause the same to be inaugurated with such ceremonies as will serve to testify the gratitude of our people for this expressive and felicitous memorial of the sympathy of our sister Republic.)

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD INDEBTEDNESS.

The morning hour having expired the Chair laid before the Senate the unfinished business, being the Senate bill to amend the Pacific Railroad acts, so as to create a sinking fund for the liquidation of the indebtedness to the Government of the Pacific Railroad Companies.

Some discussion took place as to the propriety of going on with the bill at this late day of the session, several Senators claiming that it would be impossible to pass it. Finally Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, moved to lay it on the table; but subsequently, at the request of Mr. SHERMAN, modified his motion so as to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday of December next, and it was agreed to—Yeas 29, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bailey, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Hereford, Howe, Johnston, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill, Randolph, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wadleigh, Whyte, Withers, Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Barnum, Blaine, Bontwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Chaffee, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Teller, West, Windom—28.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT AUSTIN, TEXAS.

Mr. MAXEY, of Texas, called up the House bill to provide a building for the use of the courts, Post Office, and Internal Revenue office, at Austin, Texas. Passed.

SALE OF DESERT LANDS.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, called up the House bill to provide for the sale of desert lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, Arizona, New-Mexico, and Dakota.

Mr. SARGENT submitted an amendment, "that no person should be permitted either to reserve or acquire title to more than one section of land under the act." Agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY, of Illinois, submitted an amendment providing that any person conducting water on or to desert land for the purpose of irrigation shall not acquire any exclusive right to the use of the water beyond what shall be actually necessary for redeeming and irrigating the same; but the water in all lakes, rivers, and other sources of water supply shall be held for the use of the public for irrigating and mining purposes. Agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, submitted an amendment so as to provide that such desert lands shall be surveyed before reclamation.

The amendment of Mr. Boutwell was then adopted. Also an amendment requiring the person entering upon land to pay 50 cents per acre at the time of filing with the receiver of the land-office that he intends to reclaim the land, and $1 an acre upon receiving a patent therefor. Several other drafts made by their clerk, Burgess. The drafts are dated July 19, 1875, and the firm failed eight days afterward. Bogart sold the drafts so accepted to the People's Bank as regular acceptances. The latter claims that Bogart knew he had bought the drafts from the acceptors, and should have informed it of that fact when selling the acceptances, as that was a material point in regard to their value. The question involved is whether, under these circumstances, the seller of the acceptances has made himself personally liable for their amount. Luther R. Marsh and John C. Gray appear for the plaintiff, and William A. Butler for the defendant.

THE PARISH WILL CASE AGAIN.

AN APPLICATION MADE TO HAVE THE PROBATE REVOKED—ALLEGATIONS BY A NEXT OF KIN—A REOPENING ANNOUNCED BY THE SURROGATE—THE PARTIES TO APPEAR IN COURT APRIL 6.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Tuesday, Feb. 27, 1877.

There is a flutter over the Parish will again, and the case is to be reopened in the Surrogate's Court, as will be seen by the following order and petition, which have already been filed:

SURROGATE'S COURT, DUTCHESS COUNTY.—In the matter of the allegations against the probate of the will of Thomas Parish, deceased.—On reading and filing the allegations of Sarah P. Holdridge, one of the next of kin to Thomas Parish, late of the City of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., deceased, against the validity of the last will and testament of the said Thomas Parish, deceased, and the competency of the proof thereof, and on motion of Milton A. Fowler, of counsel for the said Sarah P. Holdridge, it is ordered that a citation issue to Nathaniel B. Hayt and Peter B. Hayt, the Executors, who have taken upon themselves the execution of the said last will and testament to Mary Parish, Susie Hayt Parish, and James Parish, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Nathaniel B. Hayt, of Newburg, N. Y., all of full age, and Thomas Parish Knight, an infant son of Daniel Knight, of New-York, having no general guardian, and being under the age of 14 years, legatees, named in the said last will and testament, requiring them and each of them to appear in this court on the 6th day of April next at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of that day, to show cause why the probate of the said last will and testament should not be revoked. PETER DORLAND, Surrogate.

The petition referred to in the above order is as follows:

SURROGATE'S COURT, DUTCHESS COUNTY.—In the matter of the probate of the will of Thomas Parish, deceased.—A paper writing, bearing date May 25, 1871, purporting to be the last will and testament of Thomas Parish, deceased, and appointing Nathaniel B. Hayt and Peter B. Hayt Executors thereof, having been admitted to probate by the Surrogate of the County of Dutchess on the 21st of December, 1876, your petitioner, Sarah P. Holdridge, hereby contests the validity of such will and the competency of the proof thereof, pursuant to the provisions of Part II., Chapter VI., Title I., Article II., of the Revised Statutes, and for reasons why the said probate should be opposes, alleges:

1. That the said paper writing is not the last will and testament of the said Thomas Parish, deceased.

2. That the said Thomas Parish, deceased, was not, at the time of making and subscribing of the said paper writing, of sound mind and memory.

3. That the said Thomas Parish did not declare the said paper to be his last will and testament in the presence of the attesting witnesses.

4. That the attesting witnesses did not, nor did either of them, sign their names as witnesses at the end of said will at the request of said Thomas Parish.

5. That the said paper writing purporting to be such last will and testament was obtained, and the execution thereof by said Thomas Parish procured, by fraud and undue influence and contrivance used upon him by the principal legatee, Susie Hayt Parish, or some other person or persons unknown to your petitioner.

6. That the said paper writing was not freely and voluntarily executed or made as his last will and testament by said Thomas Parish, deceased.

7. That the said paper writing was not duly and sufficiently proved before the said Surrogate. Your petitioner further alleges that Nathaniel B. Hayt and Peter B. Hayt, named as Executors in said will, have taken upon themselves the execution thereof, and letters testamentary have been issued to them in accordance therewith, and such letters are now in full force and effect. And the said persons interested in said will are Mary Parish, Susie Hayt Parish, and James Parish, of Poughkeepsie, and Nathaniel B. Hayt, of Newburg, all of whom are of full age, Thomas Parish Knight, an infant son of Daniel Knight, of New-York, having no general guardian, and being under the age of 14 years, and Robert Parish Frost, of Poughkeepsie, who died before said Thomas Parish. And your petitioner further alleges that said Thomas Parish died leaving neither descendants, parents, brother or sister, and your petitioner is his niece and one of his next of kin. Your petitioner, therefore, prays that a citation may issue, directed to the said Executors, Nathaniel B. Hayt and Peter B. Hayt, and to the legatees above named, requiring them to appear before you, the Surrogate of the County of Dutchess, at a time and place to be therein specified, to show cause why the probate of such will should not be revoked. SARAH P. HOLDRIDGE.

Dated Feb. 20, 1877.

CAPTIVE AND CAPTOR IN THE SAME JAIL.

Andrew J. Mellen was recently called for, on a requisition from the Governor of Pennsylvania, and Gov. Robinson issued a mandate for his surrender. Mellen had been indicted for grand larceny in Philadelphia. When the officers here came to arrest him, however, they met with some difficulty. It appeared that Mellen was held in this City by the Sheriff on an order of arrest in a civil suit. At any rate, Mellen was arrested on the Governor's warrant of extradition. Habeas corpus proceedings followed, and Judge Barrett, before whom the matter came, ordered Mellen to be delivered back to the custody of the Sheriff. After this Mellen applied to Chief Justice Davis, in Supreme Court, Chambers, to be released on bail on the order of arrest. The Chief Justice rendered a decision yesterday, referring the application to Judge Barrett, but holding, however, that Mellen must give bail both on the order of arrest and on the extradition warrant before being released from the Sheriff's custody. Another feature of the proceedings against Mellen was before Judge McAdam, in the Marine Court, Chambers, yesterday. It seems that Mellen, after being arrested on the extradition warrant, caused the arrest of Joseph A. Calvert, the Philadelphia officer who had been instrumental in procuring that warrant, and had him arrested on a charge of personating an officer. After two hearings he was discharged from arrest by a Police Magistrate. On leaving the Police Court, however, Calvert was arrested on an order of arrest in a civil suit for false imprisonment, which had been begun by Mellen. The latter claims 1,000 damages. Both Calvert and Mellen are now in Ludlow-street Jail. Louis J. Grant, Calvert's counsel, applied to Judge McAdam yesterday to have the order of arrest against his client vacated. Decision was reserved.

A RAILROAD OPERATION.

Judge Barrett, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday granted an order continuing the suit of Henry Clews & Co. against the Florida Railroad Company, with J. Nelson Tappan, the plaintiff's Trustee in bankruptcy, as the plaintiff. The suit is brought on two claims, one for $6,447 40 for money paid out, and the other for $5,000 on a note of the defendant. The defense is that the money was paid out and the note given in conformity with an agreement between the company and Henry Clews & Co., H. Almy, and others, whereby these individuals contracted to subscribe and pay for $2,300,000 of the company's bonds. Before the bonds were ready for delivery, Clews & Co. and the others laid out some money for the use of the company, and the latter gave them notes, with the understanding that when the Bonds were delivered the notes were to be given up. After award $200,000 of the bonds were delivered, but the notes were not given up to the railroad company. The latter sets up a counter claim for $2,000,000 for the breach of contract on the part of Clews & Co. in not taking up the bonds.

DRAWING WATER FROM LAKE MAHOPAC.

The trial of the case of Saportas against the Mayor, &c., which is brought to recover $115,000 damages, was resumed before Judge Van Brunt and a jury in Part III. of the Supreme Court yesterday. The plaintiff called several witnesses, who testified to the depreciation of real estate, and the sickness in the plaintiff's family, caused by the drawing off of the waters of Lake Mahopac by the Croton Aqueduct Engineers in 1870. One of the witnesses was an old resident of Putnam County, whose memory went back to 1815. He testified that there had been no malaria at Lake Mahopac prior to 1870. Part of the City's defense to the action will probably be that the bed of the lake is owned by the State, and that the engineers who drew the water had license to do so from the owners of a water right at the Red Mills, an old structure, at the outlet of the lake, which was built before the Revolution.

EX-SHERIFF O'BRIEN'S BONDSMEN.

Michael Purssell brought a suit, in the Superior Court, several years ago, against James W. Brodie, and recovered judgment against the latter for $3,190 97. An execution was issued to James O'Brien, then Sheriff, against the goods of Brodie, which were duly levied on and sold. Brodie then sued O'Brien for damages, and recovered judgment against the ex-Sheriff for $16,922 34. An execution issued on this latter judgment against O'Brien's property was returned unsatisfied, and Brodie then brought a suit in the Supreme Court against O'Brien's sureties, Joseph J. O'Donohue and James McGovern. Both sureties, however, seek to escape liability. O'Donohue in his answer says that when he signed O'Brien's bond he was told that Solomon Mehrback was to be his co-surety. He says he did not sign the bond in the presence of the County Clerk; that no oath was administered to him, and that he had received no further notification, and did not know he had been accepted as surety. McGovern says when he signed O'Brien's bond he was represented to him that O'Donohue had signed it, and was responsible as surety. Judge Barrett, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday denied a motion to strike out these answers as sham.

COURT NOTES.

Thomas Thompson, of No. 243 East Fifty-ninth-street, was committed at the Fifty-seventh-street Police Court yesterday for assaulting his wife, and brutal treatment toward her generally.

The Police Commissioners paid yesterday the amount of costs in the suit of ex-Sergt. Augustus Miller, and were relieved from the disagreeable necessity of being examined in supplementary proceedings.

Judge Van Vorst, in the Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday set aside, on the ground of usury, two mortgages made by Elizabeth Langdon to William C. Gray. The latter charged even more than 10 per cent.

William Gunning, a waiter on the steam-ship City of Mexico, was arraigned before Commissioner Shields yesterday, on a charge of having assaulted John Murphy, the third assistant engineer, with a bottle while at sea on the 8th of February. He was held to answer in default of $1,000 bail.

Morris M. Cahill, aged 20, a native of Boston, of No. 304 First-avenue, was committed for trial by Justice Flammer on a charge of having stolen a gold chain and seal, valued at $25, from Mr. James B. Davidson, of No. 86 Morton-street, while he was passing through Morton-street on his way home at an early hour yesterday morning.

Judge Barrett, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday ordered a reference in the case of Caroline Engleman against Charles W. Engleman. It appears that the plaintiff in the action obtained a limited divorce from the defendant in November, 1872. By the terms of the decree he was to pay her $5 per week as alimony. She claims that there is now due to her $520 as alimony.

The suit of Boody against Ogden and others was summed up before Judge Sedgwick, in the Superior Court, Special Term, yesterday. Among the incidents was the exhibition, by means of a microscope, of certain erasures in a memorandum of the plaintiff's, by which it was attempted to show that the latter had been using Ogden's money in the Galena "pool." Judge Sedgwick reserved his decision.

Robert Earl, of No. 176 East Eighty-fifth-street, went home intoxicated on Monday night and knocked his wife down with a chair, injuring permanently her left eye. In the Fifty-seventh-street Police Court yesterday he was held for trial. When the Earls were married, 13 years ago, they had between them about $60,000, but they are now comparatively poor people on account of the husband's dissipation.

Rafael Serafino and Donati Rossi, two ill-featured and very dirty-looking Italians, were put on trial for manslaughter before Judge Brady and a jury, in the Court of Over and Terminer, yesterday. They were charged with killing John McCarthy on Dec. 9, 1876, by pushing him down the stoop of No. 57 Thompson-street. Rossi was acquitted of the charge, but Serafino was convicted of manslaughter in the fourth degree, and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment in the State Prison.

The case of John J. Lynes, as Administrator of John A. Miller, deceased, against James S. Brander and Edward Matthews, was brought to trial before Judge Van Vorst, in the Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday. The action is one of several growing out of cotton transactions in 1861 of the firm of Brander, Chamblis & Co., of New-Orleans. Matthews was the New-York partner of the firm, and he is the chief defendant in the present suit. He claims he is not liable because the civil war broke up the partnership. The case is still on.

Nathan Roth, aged 19, who claims to reside at No. 629 Sixth-avenue, was arraigned before Justice Flammer at the Washington-place Police Court yesterday, charged with grand larceny. The complaint was made by Samuel M. White, a salesman in the store of Howard, Sanger & Co., No. 462 Broadway, who alleged that he detected Roth in the act of stealing a package of pocket cutlery, valued at $65, from the store, which he visited under the pretense of making purchases. The accused was committed for trial in default of bail.

Morris Freedman, a man who has been arraigned in the Police Courts for various offenses, was charged yesterday at the Essex Market Court with personating a Deputy Sheriff and assaulting Jacob Cohen, of No. 143 Delancey-street. A few days ago Freedman went to Cohen's store and represented that he was a Deputy Sheriff, charged the complainant with having a stolen watch in his possession. When Cohen denied the allegation, Freedman abused him, and Cohen caused his arrest. Justice Wandell held the prisoner in default of $500 bail.

John McCormick brought suit as Administrator, in the Court of Common Pleas, to recover the statutory damages of $5,000 from the New-York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company. It appears that the plaintiff's wife, Ann McCormick, while trying to cross Tenth-avenue at Thirtieth-street was run over and killed by the cars of the company. The case was on trial before Judge Van Hoesen and a jury, in Part I. of the Court of Common Pleas. The jury retired to deliberate on Monday night, and came into court yesterday morning with a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount claimed.

SUIT FOR BOARD AND LODGING.

An odd suit on a claim for board and lodging was brought to trial before Judge Lawrence and a jury in Part II. of the Supreme Court yesterday. The plaintiff in the case is Adelaide M. De Lavalette, while the defendant is Frederick B. Wendt, the Executor of the late David M. Peyser. The plaintiff says that Peyser, in 1866, engaged rooms and board for himself and family at the rate of $125 a month. The contract was to continue until May, 1867. Mr. Peyser paid $500 in cash at the outset. The parties afterward had a quarrel, however, and this resulted in Peyser's leaving in October, 1866. His landlady, however, refused to part with his trunks, which she kept as security. Peyser then brought a replevin suit to recover possession of them, and the action was settled by Peyser's paying $485 and regaining the custody of his trunks. The plaintiff now sues to recover damages at the rate of $150 a week from the time that Peyser left until she obtained other tenants for the premises he had occupied. The new tenants only paid at the rate of $75 per week, and the plaintiff sues only for a claim for extra damages for the deficiency up to May, 1867. The defense s-te up is a release executed by her at the time the $485 were paid. In reply to this the plaintiff stated she did not know she had signed a release; that the same attorneys acted for her and for Peyser, and that she thought she had merely signed a consent allowing the Sheriff to remove Peyser's trunks. A witness was put on the stand yesterday to prove the damage to the plaintiff after she had obtained new tenants, but Judge Lawrence prevented an inquiry, which was attempted to be gone into, as to the increased quantity of food the new tenants consumed. The case is still on.

A VERDICT IN THE CITY'S FAVOR.

The trial of the suit of Franz Nessel against the Mayor, &c., was concluded before Judge Joseph F. Daly and a jury, in Part III. of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday. The plaintiff sued to recover $20,000 damages on account of injuries received by him in falling into the excavation for the Fourth-avenue improvement on a Sunday afternoon in 1874. The testimony as to the excavation being guarded was of a conflicting character, the plaintiff contending that there was nothing to prevent a man from falling in, and the City undertaking to show that a person, in order to get into the excavation, had to climb over a masonry wall over two feet high, and then to crawl over or under a heavy timber laid across the ends of the riders. It was hinted that the plaintiff had been drinking. The jury brought in a verdict for the City. Leary & Bischoff appeared for the plaintiff, and F. L. Stetson and E. H. Lacombe for the City.

DECISIONS.

SUPREME COURT—CHAMBERS.

By Judge Davis.

Orders Granted.—Folina vs. The Excelsior Gas Machine Company; United States Life Insurance Company vs. Jordan.

Thaule vs. Kreheler.—The action was brought for malicious prosecution, and causing plaintiff to be imprisoned. It has been tried, and verdict and judgment had for plaintiff. The affidavit of plaintiff shows that the prosecution was willful and malicious. If so, the merits of defendant were proper. (Code 179, 6 Hun. L.) Motion denied.

By Judge Donohue.

Granted.—Gano vs. McCunn; Lawrence vs. Sheppard.

Pratt vs. Ross et al.—Order settled.

By Judge Barrett.

Harris vs. Todd, Jr.—These are the only papers which have been handed up on this motion. The moving papers, pleadings, &c., are wanted.

Matter of Matthews.—Order granted.

Motion Granted, Without Costs.—Clews vs. The Florida Railroad Company. Section 5,047 of the R. S. of the United States is imperative.

Newhall vs. Smith.—Upon a careful review of these papers and briefs I think it only fair and just that this motion should be granted. The costs may abide the event, and the time for inspection should be limited. The order may be settled upon one day's notice.

Curtiss vs. Mulcahy.—Motion for leave to file a supplemental complaint to amend by bringing in a party defendant, &c., granted on payment of $10 costs of motion.

Curtiss vs. Mulcahy.—The previous order is met by the answer, which involves a long litigation. Defendant denies insolvency, but admits that taxes, &c., are unpaid. He says he is worth as much as when the bond and mortgage were executed, but does not say how much. He says the property is worth $30,000, which is not $250 over what is due, but he does not say it would bring that at foreclosure sale. A case for a Receiver is, on the whole, made out, but if defendant will, within ten days, pay all taxes, Croton water rent, and insurance, the motion may, for the present, be denied; otherwise granted.

In the Matter of Francis M. Bixby, Receiver.—(1.) The opposing affidavit proves that all communications received by Murphy, addressed to the firm, had been turned over to the Receiver. (2.) The commissions received can be accounted for before the referee, Mr. Buck. Considering the state of the accounts, it is entirely unnecessary to require such commissions to be paid to the Receiver, only to be returned to Mr. Murphy after receiver's fees, thereon, have been deducted. (3.) As to the Post Office box, Murphy cannot be deprived of that, and is not bound to turn it over to the Receiver. (4.) Both sides have spoken to assess and NOTICE.

We cannot notice anonymous communications. In all cases we require the writer's name and address, not for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.

We cannot, under any circumstances, return rejected communications, nor can we undertake to preserve manuscripts.

Are the business men of this and other cities entirely oblivious of the dangers that menace the industrial interests of the country from the project of a new election? Have they attempted to reckon up the millions we shall lose in the arrest of returning confidence, the paralysis of enterprise, and the loss of public credit which would attend a fresh struggle for the Presidency—a struggle not only of unprecedented bitterness, but whose ultimate issue, even after it had been nominally decided, would be absolutely uncertain. For it must be remembered that after we have conceded that a new election is necessary, we have entered upon a vicious circle from which no man can foretell what may be the means of escape. That concession involves the principle that any one of the two houses of Congress can, on the most frivolous pretense, throw out enough votes to invalidate another election, and another, and another, till we touch the level of Mexico, or the "man on horseback" comes to cut the knot with the sword. But accepting merely the certainty of another eight months', and the possibility of a twelve-months', wrangle over the Presidency, is it possible to exaggerate the ruin and distress which would attend such an experiment? If business men can stand idly by and see such an outrage perpetrated as the Democrats seem to meditate, they must have a very exaggerated idea of their own strength or a very inadequate conception of their responsibilities.

The blind partisanship of the action of the Democratic members of the Electoral Commission on the Oregon case has been decidedly outdone by their vote in regard to South Carolina. They made no pretense that the State ought to be counted for TILDEN, but they did hold, unanimously, that it ought not to be counted for HAYES; that, in fact, the State had failed to make any choice for Electors at all. What becomes of the alleged election of HAMPTON under this ruling they probably did not stop to inquire. They have shown not only a total inability to act otherwise than as prejudiced and short-sighted partisans, but have also, with some appearance of deliberate intent, lent themselves to the revolutionary schemes of the reckless obstructionists in the House. The "partisanship" of the Republican members of the Commission has at least been sustained by logical and defensible arguments; that of the Democrats has been consistent only in the resolve to defeat the inauguration of HAYES. Their counsel have shifted the ground of attack, and the mode of applying legal and constitutional principles at every stage of the controversy, and yet the Democrats on the Commission have contrived to adapt their decisions to every change of front and every fresh argument, however inconsistent with those preceding it.

The arguments in the South Carolina case rested substantially upon the loose and vague assertion that South Carolina had not a republican form of Government. To sustain this assertion, the Democrats offered to prove intimidation on the part of the negroes and the presence of United States troops in the State on election day. This is a gratuitous surrender of everything in the guise of principle which the Democrats have ever pretended to. If a State is to be denied all participation in the election of a President because a part of its population is disorderly, and because the Federal Government abuses its power regarding troops, then plainly the rights of the State hang on a very slender thread. The extremest theories of the radical Republicans during the reconstruction period were mild and conservative in comparison to this latest Democratic doctrine. What adds to the absurdity, as well as to the turpitude, of the thing is that the Democrats undertook to enforce their view by citing Republican arguments for the Reconstruction laws, which have always been denounced as unconstitutional and void by Democratic authorities.

All things considered, the petition now in circulation in this State praying for the appointment of THOMAS C. PLATT, of Owego, as Postmaster General in the Cabinet of President HAYES, is a piece of unqualified impertinence. Leaving out of sight the record of the man, which is as unsavory as his abilities are contemptible, it is an insult to Gen. HAYES and an abuse of partisan privilege to assume that the next President will need any such prompting to make a wise selection of his immediate advisers. If the motives of the authors of this petition were as much above question as they are obviously mercenary and mean, it would be a strong argument against the fitness of the nominee that he should need this species of advertising. We have no apprehension that President HAYES will weaken and discredit his Administration by the infusion of any such elements into it as those represented by THOMAS C. PLATT. It is, therefore, unnecessary to go very deeply into the question of what the people of New-York, as distinguished from a little clique of trading politicians, expect at his hands.

A St. Petersburg dispatch to the London Times reports that an extraordinary council of Ministers has decided that the Russian Army should be demobilized when peace was assured between Turkey and Servia and Montenegro. There is no confirmation of this surprising piece of intelligence; on the contrary, later advices throw considerable doubt on the statement. It is incredible that Russia should abandon her menacing attitude pending the reception of replies from the European powers represented at the conference. A Russian semi-official organ points out, very justly, that a conclusion of peace between Turkey and Servia would simply bring back the Eastern question to where it was when the Berlin memorandum was prepared. The powers, and especially Russia, must insist on the amelioration of the condition of Christian subjects of Turkey. So far as adequate reforms are concerned, Turkey is as far from giving them now as she ever was. It would be a great relief to Europe if Russia should show an intention to abandon all warlike preparations and belligerent purposes. It would remove all immediate apprehensions of war. It would also be a moral defeat for Russia which would surprise the rest of the world. Under the circumstances, this solution of existing difficulties is not to be expected.

We are glad to find that Mr. FISH will report to-day what promises to be a very radical and comprehensive measure for the reduction of City salaries. To obviate constitutional objections, it is in the form of a general law, scaling the reduction of salaries in accordance with their amounts. What the public demand is a reduction of the pay and numbers of heads of departments, the grading of the pay of policemen and firemen, the cutting down of the remuneration of the clerical force, and sweeping out of existence three-fourths of the crowd of political bummers who live upon the public as court attendants, &c. It is for the Legislature to apply these general principles with as much discrimination and justice as it can, and Mr. FISH's bill seems to furnish as near an approach to substantial justice and radical reform as it is possible to hope for. Mr. FLECKE'S bill in regard to the appointment of retired firemen and policemen at a moderate salary as court attendants presents a very sensible solution of one branch of the difficulty, and with proper limitations as to the numbers employed, would effectually cure some of the worst abuses of our local patronage, besides saving a good deal of money.

THE FIELD-TILDEN PROGRAMME.

The action of the House on DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S bill yesterday was revolutionary. The bill is without warrant in the Constitution. That instrument declares (Article II, section 1, paragraph 6,) that "Congress may, by law, provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President; and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected." This is all that the Constitution contains giving any authority whatever to Congress on this subject. Congress has acted under this clause and exhausted its authority by providing, in the act of March 1, 1792, (Revised Statutes, section 146,) that in any one of the contingencies named in the Constitution, the President of the Senate, or, if there be none, the Speaker of the House for the time being, shall act as President until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected. The bill passed by the House, therefore, is a pure usurpation, and on that account, if on no other, should never have been proposed, and would not have been, even by so ignorant and reckless a lawyer as FIELD, were it not intended to give effect to a scheme which is itself treasonable.

FIELD, his employer TILDEN, and the other revolutionists in the Democratic Party, have forced this bill in order to give the color of law to their plan for preventing a count under the act of Jan. 28, establishing the Electoral Commission. They will now say to the Senate: "Here is a bill providing for the vacancy that will arise from a failure to count. If you do not pass it, you are responsible for the consequences. We have now cleared the way for the remainder of our programme, and we shall proceed to carry it out." Of course, the Senate can take no notice of the proceeding. It has no right and no constitutional power to do so. The House having sanctioned a piece of gratuitous usurpation, the Senate is bound to treat it with silent contempt. It would be justified in refusing it the courtesy of a reference, and in receiving it only to lay it on the table.

It remains to be seen whether the Democratic Party is ready to yield wholly to the revolutionary faction and to go on in the policy of which FIELD'S bill is a step. They have shown great weakness in conceding as much as they have done. What their motive was, it is impossible to say. If they thought it was easier to let TILDEN'S counsel have his way in this matter, in the hope that he would not press his purpose further, and in the view that it would do no harm of itself, they have made a pitiful mistake and incurred a useless risk. They have strengthened the hands of the desperate faction which aims at preventing the count, and have given them their first taste of substantial victory since their plans have been exposed. If, on the other hand, the Democracy is in the power of the Field-Tilden faction, and intends to follow out the plot laid by its leaders, the consequences are not easily foreseen. The first of them will necessarily be another Presidential election, plunging the country into confusion and passionate contention for eight weary months, inflicting incalculable injury upon business, and possibly subjecting the Government to even severer strains than those which it has been recently compelled to undergo. Politically, a new election must be the ruin of the Democratic Party, unless the majority of the people of the United States are unfit for free government. It is incredible that a party which should be guilty of the gross bad faith involved in defeating the Electoral law which was devised and enacted by its own representatives, could survive such treachery. The delay of the count until after the 4th of March would be an act of contemptible and desperate partisan spite. It would be an avowal of the resolve to rule or ruin. It would be a declaration that no law was sacred which did not advance Democratic interests, no obligation binding which was inconsistent with Democratic designs. A party appealing to the country on such grounds would be overwhelmed, unless the people have lost all sense of the value of law and the necessity of good faith in their Government. The proceedings to-day will disclose the condition of the Democratic leaders. If they yield the first point in the way of counting the remaining States, the country will know what to expect. It will be a proof that in the struggle of TILDEN and his tools with the sober and decent portion of the party, the latter have succumbed, and that from this time out Democracy is but another name for lawlessness.

THE PATH TO BE FOLLOWED.

In the event of a quiet ending of the pending struggle, and the accession of Gov. HAYES to the Presidency, all the elements of a new form of excitement will quickly develop themselves. There is, in some shape, compensation for every ill; and when the disorganizing forces of the Democratic Party have been to a large extent exhausted, we may recognize in their long-continued operation a source of relief from the more petty but hardly less provoking contest of factions for the spoils. In a day or two the latter will probably be the familiar spectacle at Washington, and it will last until the new Administration has plainly marked out its course and indicated the elements on which it intends to rely for support. The consolation is that the period of suspense will necessarily be brief, and that the best sympathies of his party, and the best wishes of the country, will sustain the new President in the prosecution of the purposes he has already foreshadowed.

Mr. HAYES may be expected to remember what the mere office-seeking portion of his party would gladly have him forget—that his selection as the standard-bearer was made in spite of them, and not in consequence of their good will, and that he or any man in the position would have been doomed to defeat had he been identified with them in the judgment of the country. It is not in human nature for the recipient of a distinguished public favor to disregard the influences from which it is derived. Had the trading and corrupt sections of the Republican organization controlled its action at Cincinnati and dictated the nomination in their own interest, Mr. HAYES would have been left to finish his term of office at Columbus. These sections had their own friends among the candidates, the choice of any one of whom would have been everywhere regarded as an indorsement of all that has brought discredit upon the party. For the party, as well as for the people, it was fortunate that an independent spirit had been developed, with strength sufficient to overcome the avowed hostility of some and the treacherous devices of others. Gov. HAYES was chosen as a fit instrument to aid the work of reform within the party and as an exponent of its principles, as distinguished from an unworthy use of its patronage in the administration of the Government. Therefore, he owes nothing to those who will surely boast of their importance as the managers of the "machine." His nomination was in effect a declaration that in the management of the party they must give way to better men. And the party looks to him for the fulfillment of the pledge implied in his candidacy, as regards the restoration of purity to the Government and a high standard of character to its servants.

Clear as may be the path which lies before Mr. HAYES, his adherence to it will require all the discrimination and firmness of which he is possessed. An ordinary partisan would start with the idea of rewarding his friends and punishing his enemies; the patronage at his disposal would be used to strengthen the politicians to whom he happened to be indebted, and to impair the influence of all who stood in the way of his friends. The civil service would remain as it is, and the country would be called upon to submit meekly to further scandals of the sort with which it is familiar. Senators would be allowed to manipulate the patronage in a State for their own ends, regardless of the protests of the worthiest members of the party. Mr. HAYES has a totally different course before him. His earliest declaration lifted him above the suspicion of being actuated by ultimate selfish purposes. He will enter the Presidency as into the performance of a solemn trust. He is not tied to any faction. The men who will be most clamorous for favors will be those whose honest claims are the slightest. His first care will be for the interests of the whole people. And in considering claims urged in the name of the Republican Party, he will look to the party as a whole—not to any faction that may arrogate the right to speak in its name. He will offend, of course. Individual pretensions will be pressed upon him more often than the party welfare. The trading politician, who is accustomed to turn the crank and grind out his reward, will be disgusted when reminded that the promise of civil service reform is to be a reality. The self-opinionated personage who imagines that he carries the votes of a State in his pocket will almost burst with indignation when he discovers that the wants and wishes of the State must have the precedence. All these hindrances and trials will come upon Mr. HAYES the moment he reaches Washington. He cannot hope to escape them. His comfort and strength must come from the rectitude of well-defined purposes; he is happily free from entangling alliances, and his force of character must be relied upon to save him from the blunders which a temporizing President would inevitably make.

Thus situated, Mr. HAYES will need all the moral help that can be rendered him by Republicans who are not office-seekers, and who care only for the usefulness of the party and the good of the country. He is told beforehand that the Democratic fomenters of anarchy will not cease assailing the title by which he will hold his office, and that they will concede to him neither support nor courtesy. There are still reasons for hoping, that while Democrats of this class may show that they are as unmindful of the manners of gentlemen as of the morals of statesmen, others now of their party will interpret generously Mr. HAYES' motives and judge of his administration by its fruits. Still, it is evident that if he is to fulfill the expectations entertained respecting him, he must be heartily sustained by the main body of the Republican Party throughout the country. The choice he will be constrained to make will be between sinister, huckstering politicians and the people; and the people must stand by him if he is to succeed.

CHAOS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

There is panic among the Blue Noses. In one fatal hour the whole fabric of civil government has apparently fallen. Compacts of every sort—civil, religious, and social—which have been concluded at any time these seven years past, are said to be not worth the paper on which they were written. The social fabric, so far as it has a seven years' growth, has crumbled into nothingness. There is no civil government, no Parliament, no civil burial, no judicial quietus, no deed of trust, no testamentary will, no baptismal register, so far as any of these fail to antedate the year 1869. Is it any wonder that sudden consternation reigns among the people whom HOLMES has described as "cerulean-tinted nasal"? To explain: Nova Scotia is a province of the Empire of Great Britain. As such, its legal forms and ceremonies are prescribed by the Imperial Government. The sign of authority in the province is the great seal, the device and legend of which are regulated by the member of the British Government who governs the colonies from London. In 1869, this functionary ordered a change in the provincial seal. Whether it had been a cod-fish, rampant, and was changed to a blue-nose potato saltant, with suitable Latin legend, we are not informed. At any rate, the substitution was ordered, and the great seal of the province was supposed to have gone home on the retired list. It was a whim. In this country, when the Government has a whim, it orders a new postage stamp. When the public has become thoroughly familiar with the latest device, it is abolished for a new one. Captious people say that this is done for the purpose of giving a job to a stamp contractor. This is not true. It is a whim of the Government. In Great Britain, on the other hand, they change the seal. But, as this is only once in seven years, the colonists submit without a murmur, and go right on marrying and giving in marriage under the new seal with as much cheerfulness as a Blue Nose is capable of.

The great seal of Nova Scotia was changed by imperial orders seven years ago. The theory of this change is that her Britannic Majesty, on glancing at the cod-fish, rampant, or whatever it was, under which the Blue Noses had lived and flourished ever since 1713, expressed her astonishment at such an inappropriate device, and ordered that the esculent of the province (if it was the potato) be thenceforth graven, saltant, on the seal. At any rate, this was the intent and meaning of the royal order then promulgated. Will it be believed that the Nova Scotians went right on with their codfish rampant, just as though the Queen's objections thereto had never been heard of? This was exactly the length and depth of their crime. The other day a Queen's Counsel appointed by the Nova Scotian Government appeared at Toronto and somewhat ostentatiously exhibited his commission. The heraldic expert who glanced at the seal of the document was paralyzed with horror as he beheld, not the saltant potato which her Britannic Majesty had ordered, but the obsolete and rampant codfish of other days. He called the attention of her Majesty's Court to this impertinence. Upon inquiry, the weather-beaten seaman who acts as Premier of the Province of Nova Scotia admitted that this seal had been used ever since he had been in the sealing business. Thereupon the court, says the dispatch, "expressed astonishment at such contempt for her Majesty's authorized and expressed opinion, and said that all acts requiring the great seal, since 1869, were totally void." Elections, official commissions, and civil contracts of every sort under them are consequently null and void.

It is difficult for the mind of man to conceive the confusion which this decision has brought upon Nova Scotia. All people married in the province during the past seven years are thereby unmarried; their children are born out of wedlock, and those who apprehensively considered themselves tied for life to their conjugal partners are free to go their several ways. Let the reader who chafes under the marriage bond be suddenly convinced that he [or she] was never married, but is as free as a bird of the air, and he [or she] will guess what the happy Nova Scotian, married since 1869, feels now. Men and women who looked across the raging main and sighed for the marital freedom of this happy land have no need for divorce suits; they were never married. But, on the other hand, people who were divorced, as they thought, by due form of law during these seven years, are married as fast as ever. If they have remarried under the obsolete seal, they have merely been trifled with, and their present partners are single. The friend of humanity shudders to think of fathers and mothers going anxiously about among their offspring to find which were legitimately born under the lawful great seal, and which are bereft of honorable parentage. Men who have paid taxes may demand their money back. They paid to a usurping and illegal Government without a seal. Mortgages are worthless, and the men who executed them are discharged of their obligations. Title deeds are waste paper. Convicts in jail may demand freedom on the ground that they have been illegally tried and committed; and the honest fishermen who play at Parliament may return to their nets—their writs of election are void. Even the codfish caught by virtue of a provincial license were illegally captured and wrongfully made into fish balls.

Exactly how the chaos is to be reduced, no man has dared to say. The Dominion Chief Justice darkly intimates that "imperial legislation will be necessary." But, while the British Parliament is debating how it shall re-marry all these divorced couples, and re-divorce all these un-married ones, at one blow, what advantages may not the subtle Blue Noses take of the situation. Imagine a country in which all social and legal obligations are suspended for a month. In the confusion which would ensue, all sorts of terrible and comical things are possible. There have been modifications of social chaos ever since the confusion at Babel. The French imperfectly experimented in that direction. But unless the Supreme Court is in error, Nova Scotia is an awful example of the anarchy which legal technicalities may bring upon a people.

BLUE MEN.

Neither Dr. PONZA nor Gen. PLEASONTON was the first person who made use of the alleged medicinal properties of the color blue. Dr. PONZA discovered that blue glass exercised a most beneficial influence upon insane patients, and thereupon Gen. PLEASONTON tried it, and was so delighted with its effect that he published a pamphlet upon the subject. Both of these distinguished men were, however, anticipated by the traditional monkey, who painted the tip of his tail sky-blue and complacently remarked that the effect was "neat but not gaudy." He, doubtless, did not fully understand the hygienic properties of blue, but of him it may certainly be said that he painted better than he knew. Beyond a doubt his blue tail outgrew the uncultivated tails of his fellow-monkeys, and thus illustrated the value of blue, centuries before PONZA or PLEASONTON entertained the least idea of being born.

It is a narrow conception of the usefulness of blue which requires us to use it in the shape of blue glass. If blue glass is good, so is blue paint, blue cloth, and blue curtains. This truth has already been dimly perceived by one or two of Gen. PLEASONTON'S disciples, but it was left for a returned missionary to prove that blue in any form always retains its wonderful tonic properties. The missionary in question spent a large part of his life in New-Zealand, where he moved in the best heathen circles, and enjoyed the friendship of the most eminent cannibals. The New-Zealander is addicted to tattooing himself in a great variety of patterns and colors, and the missionary soon noticed that those who were tattooed blue were much more stalwart than red, green, or yellow heathen. He found, moreover, that a heathen who tattooed himself blue above the waist and yellow below would soon develop great breadth of chest and power of lungs, while his yellow legs would shrink and dwindle into comparative insignificance. The meaning of these facts could not be misapprehended, and the missionary was forced to believe that the effect of blue pigment, introduced under the human cuticle, is in the highest degree beneficial.

It would not be difficult to show that blue clothing has also a stimulating effect upon the wearer. DANIEL WEBSTER always wore a blue coat, and it is needless to remark that he was simply full of intellect. ANDREW JOHNSON was also addicted to blue coats, whence doubtless he derived that wonderful strength of mind that irreverent persons mistook for obstinacy. The blue-uniformed Federal soldiers overpowered the gray legions of the South, and the blue-coated French troops which had uniformly beaten the white-coated Austrians, were, nevertheless defeated by Germans dressed in uniforms of a still darker shade of blue. It should be noted, however, that blue clothing, while its influence upon the brain cannot be doubted, has little or no effect upon the body. It stimulates the intellect, develops courage and other moral qualities, but it does not affect growth and development of the physical frame. Thus, the wearing of blue stockings undoubtedly stimulates the intellectual powers of New-England ladies who write poetry and advocate the immediate reformation of everything, but there is no reason to suppose that it develops—that is to say, that it improves the proportions—in short, it does nothing of the kind. All the evidence goes to show that blue stockings benefit the mind and not the muscles, and in this respect blue clothing of any sort is much inferior to glass or tattooing.

We need not, then, waste our time by dressing in blue or by sitting under blue glass. Tattooing is what we really need. A blue band, two inches wide, pricked upon the forehead would doubtless prove a sovereign prophylactic against headaches, while those who have the courage to have their heads shaved and their scalps tattooed with Antwerp blue will develop brain power at a rate which will astonish their warmest admirers. If TALMAGE were to have both his legs tattooed blue, his eloquence would become so vigorous that nothing but a cast-iron pulpit could withstand it; and if DONN PIATT were to employ some skillful anatomist to ascertain the probable locality of his brain, and to tattoo it with care and thoroughness, he might develop sufficient intellect to discover whether he is more of a fool than a knave, and thus relieve his present distressing uncertainty. Instead of painfully undergoing gymnastic tortures, young men covetous of muscle need only tattoo their arms and chests in order to rival a Yale oarsman in physical strength, and could maintain their digestive powers unimpaired among all the horrors of the boarding-house table by simply tattooing a broad blue belt around the lower vest-pocket region.

But after all why should we prick blue paint into our surfaces when we can dye ourselves permanently blue by simply swallowing excessive doses of nitrate of silver? The process is perfectly painless, and it has the advantage of coloring not only the cuticle but the entire tissue of the body, as any one can readily ascertain by first dyeing himself deep blue and then sinking experimental shafts in different parts of his person. The truth is, the white man is a mistake. He should have been born blue, and since he now knows that to be blue is to be healthy—and probably wealthy and wise—and that nitrate of silver will turn him quickly and permanently blue, he should throw away his blue glass and his blue clothing, and swallow the largest doses of nitrate of silver that his physician can be induced to prescribe.

ALBANY.

BUSINESS IN BOTH HOUSES.

THE ANNUAL APPROPRIATION BILL FURTHER DISCUSSED IN THE ASSEMBLY—NEW BILLS INTRODUCED IN HOUSE AND SENATE — COMMITTEE WORK — THE NEW CAPITOL DOME.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Tuesday, Feb. 27, 1877.

A full House and Senate reassembled this morning, after a few days of recess, and immediately proceeded to work with a will. The House had the annual Appropriation bill on hand, the snag on which it had struck last week being the appropriation of $300,000 for the National Guard. It looked as if this would be cut down to $200,000 when the House adjourned for the recess; and the Adjutant General, much alarmed at the prospect, sent out a circular note to all National Guard commanders calling upon them to rally upon their respective members of Assembly and endeavor to bring them to a more liberal frame of mind. The Guard responded nobly to the call; they not only skirmished with scattered individuals in the separate districts, but they boldly charged in a solid body, composed exclusively of Captains, Majors, Colonels, Brigadier Generals, and other high-grade commanders, on the Legislature itself, so that the Assembly Chamber this morning when the discussion was renewed upon the item, really swarmed with these heroic wearers of gorgeous uniforms. The battle was long and fierce, but in the end the organized forces of the military were victorious, and the item was passed as it stood. It is not safe, however, for in the House, where a yea and nay vote can be taken, the reduction may yet be made. When this long contested item had been disposed of the bill sailed along smoothly until the appropriation for the payment of the salaries of the Commissioners to revise the Statutes was reached. Then arose Mr. LANG, of St. Lawrence, who had just recovered from a cold which had deprived him of his voice, and forthwith made the House aware of his entire convalescence by a vigorous attack on the item. It was nearly 2 o'clock, so, as it was evident that another long controversy was before the House, the bill was put over till to-morrow. One more item, after the last named, will probably be fought over, viz., the appropriation for Normal schools. Mr. RUGGLES, of Steuben, is lying low for this, prepared to slaughter it with a big speech, which he has waiting in his desk for the purpose. It is scarcely probable that the bill will be disposed of to-morrow. The session was extended half an hour to allow of the introduction of bills, reports of committees, &c.

The Senate transacted a great deal of merely routine business, calling for little comment. Several bills affecting New-York were introduced in both houses. Mr. COWDIN introduced the following Salary bill:

SECTION 1. The total appropriation for salaries to be paid by the City of New-York for the year 1877, and for every year thereafter, shall be 10 per cent. less than the amount paid for salaries by the said City in the year 1876.

SEC. 2. A commission, consisting of the Mayor, the Controller, and the President of the Board of Tax Commissioners of said City, shall report to the Legislature, on or before the fourth Tuesday in March, a complete salary list, the aggregate amount of which shall not exceed the limit fixed by the first section of this act.

Mr. PURDY introduced a bill transferring control over all public works in the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards from the Department of Parks to that of Public Works. It provides that the Common Council shall have exclusive power to provide by resolution and ordinance for the regulating, grading, paving, curbing, and guttering of streets, roads, and avenues, the flagging of sidewalks, the filling of sunken lots, and the fencing of vacant lots, and for sewerage and drainage in the wards mentioned. All this work is to be done under the direction and care of the Superintendent of Public Works. The maintenance in good order, removal of obstructions, and general care of the streets and avenues is given to the Public Works Department, and all appropriations heretofore made for the purpose to the Department of Public Parks is transferred to the first-named department. No existing contract is to be affected by the bill.

Another bill aimed at rapid transit has made its appearance, being about the fifteenth which has been brought into this Legislature. Senator WAGSTAFF introduced it. It amends the first section of the act of 1860, relating to railroads in the City, making it read as follows:

SECTION 1. It shall not be lawful hereafter to lay, construct, or operate any railroad in, upon, or along any or either of the streets or avenues of the City of New-York, wherever such railroads may commence or end, except under the authority and subject to the regulations and restrictions which the Legislature may hereafter grant and provide. This section shall not be deemed to affect the operation, as far as laid, of any railroad now constructed and duly authorized. Nor shall it be held to impair in any manner any valid grant for or relating to any railroad in said City existing on the 1st day of January, 1860. Nor shall it be deemed to affect the operation or to impair or limit in any manner the right of any duly authorized corporation to build, construct, operate, or maintain any railroad the right of way for which shall be purchased through the blocks, under chapter 140 of the Laws of 1850, entitled "An act to authorize the formation of railroad corporations and to regulate the same," passed April 2, 1850, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; and which railroad shall be so constructed as to pass under or over all the intervening streets or avenues in such a manner as not to prevent the use thereof by the public.

Senator BIXBY introduced a bill to amend an act of last year, by extending the time for the payment of arrears of taxes in the City of New-York from one year to three years. The interest on such arrears is to be at the rate of 7 per cent., calculated from the time the tax was imposed.

Senator BAADEN introduced a bill to abolish the office of the attorney for the collection of arrears of personal taxes, and providing that the duties of such officer shall be discharged by the Receiver of Taxes, without additional compensation therefor.

I see that Mr. AUCHMUTY has again rushed into print to dispute statements made in THE TIMES concerning the new Capitol building. I have not time now to answer the gentleman at length, and will content myself with taking one single assertion in his letter. It will illustrate how loosely some people talk about the new plans, which they appear not to have seen. Mr. AUCHMUTY says:

"The new design is to be surmounted with a dome. The interior of a dome is one of the most beautiful of architectural forms. Its swelling lines give an idea of grandeur and strength, combined with grace and lightness, which can be obtained in no other way. The proposed dome at Albany is a huge and expensive case for four stone staircases, which lead only to the cupola. These four staircases spring from a gallery around the base of the dome, and meet together in the centre at a point about two-thirds its height. Here they form a platform, from which rises a spiral staircase extending up into the cupola. Instead of looking upward into a vast open space, as at St. Peter's, St. Paul's, or at Washington, the spectator at Albany will see above him nothing but a confused and dizzy-looking mass of staircases."

The statement italicised caused me to go over to the architect's office and to accurately measure the scale drawings of the dome. Instead of the staircases referred to meeting at a "point about two-thirds" the height of the dome, they meet at a point nearly thirteen-fourteenths the height; that is to say, instead of the spiral staircase filling up one-third of the dome, it fills less than one-fourteenth. Will this destroy the "vast open space" which Mr. AUCHMUTY justly admires in the interior of a dome? One word more. The original plans provided for no dome, but for an immense pyramid-shaped tower. I would ask if Mr. AUCHMUTY or anybody else, could see any beauty in looking up the square shaft of a mine? This was the view which the interior of the tower would have presented. It would be well for gentlemen who declaim so confidently about the new plans to examine them first.

The Senate bills making the offices of Coroner and of Commissioner of Jurors salaried offices were taken up in the Committee on Cities this afternoon, but by request the consideration of the Coroner's bill was put over till to-morrow, and of the other till Tuesday. Final hearings will be given on those days, and the bills will be reported without further delay. Mr. FLECKE has ready for presentation a bill which provides that the Board of Apportionment shall have exclusive power to appoint all court attendants, janitors, doorkeepers, messengers, &c., and it requires that all appointments to such positions shall be made from retired firemen and policemen, and the salary of such appointees is fixed at $600. It provides further that when a policeman or fireman, by reason of old age, is retired, a certificate equivalent to the discharge papers of a soldier shall be given to him, and if he wishes a position as door-keeper, &c., he shall file a copy of such certificate in the Mayor's office. The Mayor is to keep a list of such applicants, and the Fire and Police Departments are also to keep lists of their retired men. The selections for positions are to be made by the Board of Apportionment from the official list in the Mayor's office. It is expressly prohibited that any appointment such as referred to shall be made from any other class of persons than those named, while there are any applicants remaining on the list. The bill will require some amendment, but nothing of a material character. It seems almost too good to pass, but it is one that this Legislature ought to pass.

A petition was circulated among the members of the Legislature to-day for signatures in favor of the appointment of Thomas C. Platt, of Owego, for Postmaster General in the Hayes Cabinet. It is understood to be a Conkling movement to prevent the appointment of Mr. Evarts, and is said to be going in various parts of the State.

Mr. FISH will report a bill to-morrow cutting down salaries in New-York in a very radical manner. It is a general bill applying to all cities, but will reach only the Metropolis. All salaries of $10,000 and upward are to be cut down 25 per cent.; those from $5,000 to $10,000 are to be cut down 20 per cent.; those from $3,000 to $5,000, 15 per cent.; those from $1,500 to $3,000, 10 per cent.

THE ASSEMBLY HALL DISGRACED.

AN UNPRECEDENTED SESSION—A GANG OF ALBANY ROUGHS IN THE GALLERIES—MEMBERS GROANED AND HISSED AT—THE CHAMBER FINALLY CLEARED OF THE DISREPUTABLE CROWD.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

ALBANY, Feb. 27.—The House held an evening session for the disposal of the contested election case of Braman against Curran. This was a local affair, and the district is about the worst in Albany. Curran is the sitting member and a Democrat, and the whole gallery of the House was filled with a gang of roughs and scoundrels, the very scourings of the gutters and grog shops of the city. While Mr. Grady was making one of his characteristic speeches this choice gang burst into loud applause. Instantly Mr. Husted was on his feet demanding and insisting that the galleries be cleared. Gen. Spinola, and several other Democrats, tried desperately to stop this, raising points of order and inquiring about rights, questions of privilege, &c. The Speaker stood up, meeting every one promptly, but they failed to shake him, or get Mr. Husted to withdraw his demand. Then the mob in the gallery broke out into loud hisses, groans, and yells, and the Doorkeepers and Sergeants at Arms could scarcely do their duty. All business was stopped, and there was great excitement on the floor. Finally the galleries were cleared, the doors locked, and the discussion was resumed. The debate went on till 11:30, the Democrats doing nearly all the talking. In fact, when the previous question was at last ordered, it was ordered almost unanimously, for all the talkers were tired out. Then the vote was taken, and the contesting member seated. The Republicans, in return for allowing the debate to go on as it did, got abused with a vindictiveness and fury more violent than I ever remember to have heard before in the Assembly Chamber.

NEW LAWS FOR NEW-JERSEY.

AN IMPORTANT INSURANCE BILL INTRODUCED—DEFEAT OF A BILL FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD—ENLARGING THE STATE PRISONS—TAX MATTERS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

TRENTON, Tuesday, Feb. 27, 1877.

The House had a lively discussion this morning over a bill growing out of the competition between the great rival railroad corporations—the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio Roads. The bill amends a section of the act of 1875 authorizing the purchasers of railroads, &c., under mortgage sale to organize themselves into a body corporate with the same power as the railroad company had possessed, so as to make it retroactive; and also authorizes railroad companies of this State to connect and consolidate with railroads in Delaware and Maryland. The bill is said to have been a cover for a scheme to build a bridge across Delaware Bay, by which to connect the Baltimore and Ohio Road with the New-Jersey Southern, and so give the Maryland Railroad, through the Southern and the New-Jersey Central, a clear track to New-York City. During the debate upon it some one mentioned Jay Gould's name in connection with it. That was the signal for a general assault upon the bill. Mr. Brigham advocated its passage, as did one or two others. When the roll was called on the question of its final passage it received but 17 votes out of a possible 60, and was defeated.

Another bill of great importance to the tax-payers of the State was defeated in the House this afternoon. It was one providing that no deductions from the taxable value of real estate should be allowed on account of personal indebtedness. The members conceived the idea that it was in some way connected with the mortage-exemption question, and it received only 19 votes. The bill repealing the law authorizing the publication of the laws in the newspapers was also defeated.

Among the bills which passed the House was Mr. Bergen's bill appropriating $100,000 in part payment of a contemplated addition to the State Prison, and Mr. Brigham's bill providing that where a larceny is committed on a train in one county, the thief may be tried and punished in any other county in the State.

The houses in joint meeting to-day appointed James N. Davis Police Justice of Jersey City, Bernard McCormack, Amzi J. Dean, and William H. Hegeman, Jr., Police Justices of Newark, and a host of Commissioners of Deeds.

At the morning session of the Senate Senator Ward introduced a bill authorizing the Secretary of State to apply for an injunction whenever the assets of a life or fire insurance company organized in the State (after charging the amount required for reinsurance of all outstanding risks and proper liabilities excepting capital stock paid in) are less than three-quarters of the capital, or when the Secretary of State deems the prosecution of business by such company hazardous to the public, Companies not organized in this State, but doing business on the mutual plan, may be admitted to transact business if their cash assets amount to $150,000. The outstanding risks of any life or fire company shall not be reinsured in any other company unless by consent of two-thirds of the policy-holders and with the approval of the Secretary of State. The Receiver of a company may reinsure policies on the approval of the Secretary of State, and he shall file a record of his transactions during the following January, or when his business is concluded. All companies not complying with the provisions of this act are forbidden to do or to solicit business in the State. The penalty for a violation of the act is $500.

A bill was also introduced into the Senate requiring all corporations to file annually with the Secretary of State a list of their officers, Directors, &c. An act designed to afford security for depositors in savings banks provides that when the annual deposits exceed $10,000, and the surplus is less than $2,000, any depositor may apply to the Court of Common Pleas for a thorough examination of the accounts of the bank. A bill has also been introduced designed to relieve from taxation the real or personal estate of railways, turnpikes, insurance, canal, and banking corporations, savings banks, cemeteries, church property, and all purely charitable and educational institutions.

THE EXHIBITION COMPANY.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 27.—At a meeting of the stockholders of the International Exhibition Company this afternoon, in the building known as Judges' Hall, on the grounds of the late Centennial Exhibition, J. E. Kingsley presiding, it was decided to increase the capital stock of said company to $600,000. It is expected that the exhibition will be opened with imposing ceremon

RUSSIA, TURKEY, AND SERVIA.

DISPOSITION OF RUSSIA AS AFFECTED BY THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH SERVIA—AN UNDERSTANDING REACHED BETWEEN THE PROVINCE AND THE PORTE.

LONDON, Feb. 27.—The Times, in its second edition, publishes a dispatch from its St. Petersburg correspondent, saying: "An extraordinary council of the Ministers was held here yesterday, at which the Czar presided. Gen. Ignatieff was present. I learn on the best authority that it was decided to demobolize the Russian Army where peace is signed between the Porte and Servia and Montenegro."

In the House of Commons this afternoon, Hon. Robert Bourke, Under Secretary for the Foreign Department, in reply to a question, said the Government had received no confirmation of the above statement. Lord Derby visited Count Schouvaloff, the Russian Ambassador at London, who likewise had no information on the subject.

A later dispatch from St. Petersburg says nothing is known there of the report regarding a Council meeting and a decision.

The Golos says the conclusion of peace between Servia and Turkey would bring the Eastern question back to the same position as at the time of the Berlin memorandum. When peace is concluded the moment will therefore have arrived when the question of the amelioration of the condition of the Christians must again be raised.

The Berlin correspondent of the Times repeats the assertion that, far from desiring war, the Russian Government at this moment displays a marked inclination to content itself with some few concessions.

The Paris correspondent of the Telegraph says: "I hear from St. Petersburg that the policy of the peace party was unhesitatingly manifested at a Cabinet Council, and is in fair way to prevail; that Russia will in all probality abandon the idea of isolated action; and that she means in certain eventualities to demonstrate the southern Army."

A telegram from Constantinople states that an understanding was finally established today between the Porte and Servia. The protocol will certainly be signed tomorrow. The Turks will evacuate Servian territory within 12 days after the signing of the protocol. The Servian delegates will subsequently hand the Porte a note giving guarantees for the future. The note will treat of four points, viz.: The erection of new fortifications in Servia; the hoisting of the Ottoman flag side by side with that of Servia on existing forts; recognition of equal rights of Jews and Christians, and the prevention of armed bands from crossing the frontier. The questions of the appointment of an Ottoman agent in Belgrade and the future ownership of Little Zwornik are set aside for the present.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times says the general declarations made by Turkey of her willingness to give guarantees if she does not succeed in introducing reforms after a certain interval of grace have now come up again in a more precise form, namely: "That the period of three years be given the Porte to carry through by means of the Constitution the reforms demanded by the powers; if the Porte does not succeed it will pledge itself to accept the guarantees proposed by the conference. The news of this disposition on the part of the Porte comes from various sides, so it may be supposed that there is a wish that it should be known. It may be meant only as a feeler and as a counter-project to a suggestion which is attributed to Russia that the powers should grant a certain interval, but pledge themselves to use coercion if the reforms are not effected at its expiration. It, however, deserves attention as the first step taken by Turkey since the conference indicating a desire to approach the views of the powers. There seems to be common ground between the Turkish and Russian suggestions on which an understanding may not be altogether impossible, if what now comes merely as a report from various quarters really represents the views and intentions of the Porte.

In the face of the Russian Telegraphic Agency's authoritative contradiction of an impending movement of the Russian army across the Pruth, there is again news to-day that the Roumanian railway companies have received an intimation from the Russian head-quarters to prepare everything for the transportation of troops. It is said that the Russians also sent detailed instructions for the regulation of the whole transportation business. There can be little doubt that all preparations are being gradually made for action. For all that, Russia may not have yet fixed a time and may thus with thus with good conscience contradict the reports about immediate action.

The Times' Belgrade dispatch says it is rumored that the Deputies at the opening of the Skuptschina to-day will formally ask the Goveerment whether Russia or Russians advised them to commence the late war will request a definite statement of the exact relations now existing between Russia and Servia.

It is also intimated that the Skuptchina will ask the Ministers to delay the final signing of the treaty of peace until the course of Russia is finally decided. The great fear of the Servians is that they might lose all chance of participating in a Russian success by concluding a premature treaty with the Porte.

The Daily News' correspondent at Vienna says that it is confidently asserted that Russia will dispatch to-day a second circular to the powers, pointing out the intolerable uncertainty of the present crisis and reminding them that the first circular still remains unanswered.

VIENNA, Feb. 27.—The Political Correspondence publishes the following special dispatch from St. Petersburg:

"Announcements of immediately pending military action are premature. There is, however, in any case a prospect that energetic steps will be taken. The decision depends on the replies of the powers to the Russian circular. The answer of England is expected at the end of the present week."

LONDON, Feb. 28.—The Standard's special from Vienna reports that the Russian authorities have ordered the arrest of a Turkish cavalry general named Konduch, who is charged with acretly traveling through the Caucasus and collecting money for the Turkish wounded.

INSTITUTE OF MINING ENGINEERS.

FIRST SESSION OF ITS SPRING MEETING—REPORTS OF COMMITTEES—A VALUABLE COLLECTION OF METALS AND MINERALS RECEIVED FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The American Institute of Mining Engineers held the first session of its February meeting at the rooms of the American Society of Civil Engineers, No. 4 East Twenty-third-street, last evening. Prof. Rossiter W. Raymond presided and Mr. T. M. Brown acted as Secretary. The Chairman delivered a brief opening address, in which he said that America had made rapid strides in the progress of invention and discovery during the past year. European engineers were looking with particular interest at American inventions, as this was the country above all others in which to experiment, owing to the fertility of its resources and the necessity thrust upon its inventors by excessive competition. The American people had accomplished many things which had been considered absurd until they were accomplished, but, like Mark Twain's beaver, they were forced to climb a tree whether they could or not. An election of members followed, in which 47 were admitted to membership, including many graduates of German universities and a Japanese student. Several resolutions were read by the Chairman, which he said had been sent in to him, but which he did not propose to put to a vote, for the reason that the society, in his opinion, should not commit itself to the indorsement or rejection of propositions in that manner. Considerable discussion was had upon the subject, and a vote being taken resulted in the opinion of the Chair being sustained. A paper was next read by William M. Courtis, entitled "The North Shore of Lake Superior as a Mineral bearing District." There was little in the paper which was new, and it elicited no discussion. A large number of specimens of ore accompanied the paper and were placed in the museum of the society. Mr. Rodney B. Coxe, Chairman of the Centennial Committee, made a report of the work of the committee at the Exposition at Philadelphia last year, and said that the register of names of visitors who had visited the rooms of the society was a document of which the society might well be proud. The amount of money expended by the committee was $4,168 45, and no indebtedness had been incurred. A testimonial was received from the Swedish Mining Engineers, of Stockholm, thanking the American Society for its kindly interest in the Swedish visitors to the Centennial Exhibition.

Mr. John S. Alexander, of Philadelphia, Chairman of the Museum Committee, submitted a report showing the contributions from foreign Governments and Commissioners, and both foreign and American exhibitors of mineral and metallurgical displays at the Centennial Exhibition, to the Museum of the Institute. Nearly every foreign country is represented in the collection, as well as many mining districts of this country. The original cost of this collection was $100,000. Among the collection were 200 specimens from the different royal Prussian lead and salt works, with drawings and statistics presented by the German Government; the Fagersta, Sweden, collection of ores and finished steel with 250 samples; Prince Paul Demidoff's collection, and a number of armor plates tested by the British Admiralty. A portion of Memorial Hall, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, has been set apart by the Pennsylvania Museum and School of Industrial Art for the accommodation of this collection, which has already been transferred to that building. It is the intention of the Institute to make this one of the most complete and systematically arranged collections in the country, and it will be open to the general public, as well as to technical students and professional men. At the close of the report the meeting adjourned.

THE FINE ARTS.

SALE FOR THE LADIES' ART ASSOCIATION.

On Thursday and Friday next, in the evening, and on Saturday afternoon, there will be a sale of pictures and bric-à-brac under the auspices of the Ladies' Art Association. The sale will be conducted by George A. Leavitt & Co. at their gallery, No. 817 Broadway. The purpose of the association is to promote the interests of women artists solely, and to that end a life class for the use of women was started, the fees for attendance being placed at a very low figure. Landscape painting has also been taught by Mr. A. H. Wyant, and latterly classes have been formed for learning to paint on china, silk, wood, and slate. Hence the list of articles now on exhibition at No. 817 Broadway embraces a very wide range. There are oil-paintings both in landscape and figure, crayons, pen and ink drawings, water-colors, and various objects connected with household decoration. There are some models in plaster, and not a few examples of needlework. The intention of the lady managers is to make the association industrial as well as philanthropical in scope; they are trying to aid women to become artists by supplying teachers, models, and materials at cost price, and propose in this way to assist them in disposing of their work. It has seemed best to them to restrict their charitable favors to persons of their own sex, perhaps from fear that the superior producing power of male artists would crowd out women's work, and thus defeat the object of their organization.

The pictures on exhibition this year are made up in a large degree of flowers, for which women have a constitutional fondness. But there are also attempts at more difficult subjects, as for instance the pictures of Miss M. J. Wood. Her painting of an old man seated is careful and promising. It is either labeled wrong or the catalogue, which is a shocking example of careless printing throughout, is in fault. But the picture will be known from the description. Miss H. M. Knowlton, of Boston, has a marine, under No. 35, "Short Sands, York, Maine," which hardly reaches her usual level of good work. Some good flower painting in oils will be found at Nos. 41 and 42. "Wistaria" and "Field Flowers," by Miss A. C. Nowell, and Miss M. E. Monk's "Calla" (No. 47) ought also to receive a mention. "A Hebe of the Eighteenth Century" is a large three-quarter length, by Miss M. R. Oakey, which received much praise in the newspapers last year when exhibited for the first time at the Academy of Design. No. 58, "Azaleas in a Venetian Vase," by the same artist, has some exceedingly good points. It is inclosed in a frame of fanciful design. Mrs. C. B. Cuman may be said to take the prize for landscape in No. 74, "Near Lake Lonely, Saratoga." A picture very remarkable for sentiment and skill. But Miss M. R. Oakey has a charcoal sketch under No. 292, of "Twilight, Manchester," which comes very near it as far as regards the former quality. In fruit pictures there will be found a noticeable canvas by Mrs. H. P. Gray, showing a bunch of black Hamburg grapes against a wall. Miss M. L. Stone exhibits a pleasing study of an interior with child, called "Bed-time," well painted, with a strong feeling for tones of a brown variety. Miss Holdich's figure of a boy, called "In the Grosser Garten, Dresden," deserves a high rank in this collection. The figure has great freshness and naturalness. There are many tiles, vases, dishes, and shells, decorated by different hands, wax flowers, painted white wood articles, plaster casts gilded and silvered, and other bric-à-brac too numerous to mention. The frames will be sold with the pictures at the prices printed in the catalogue. Let us hope that by Thursday the catalogue will be revised.

AMUSEMENTS.

BRIEF MENTION.

"Wild Oats" will be acted at Wallack's Theatre this evening.

Miss Abbott will sing in "La Figlia" at the Brooklyn Academy of Music to-night.

Mr. Ole Bull and Mme. Essipoff will take part in this evening's concert at Steinway Hall.

Miss Jennie Hughes, Mlle. Paladino, and Signor Mascagno have joined the company at Niblo's, and appear nightly in the "reconstructed" spectacle of "Around the World."

A telegraphic invitation to witness "Our Boarding House" at the Park Theatre, has been extended to President-elect Hayes, in case he should visit New-York this week.

The drama called "Inshavogue," with Mr. John T. Hinds, from the Theatre Royal, Dublin, in the leading rôle, is the current attraction at the New Broadway Theatre. The play deals with incidents and personages appealing strongly to spectators interested in Irish history.

The Philharmonic Society of Staten Island will give their fourth concert, this season, on Friday evening next. Miss Drasdil, Mr. Fritsch, Mr. Mollenhauer, Mr. Rietzel, Mr. Verner, Mr. Hamm, Mr. Risch, and Mr. Hausknecht are to be the artists, and the programme will have for its pièce de résistance Schubert's quintet in A, known as "The Trout."

OBITUARY.

SAMUEL L. HOWE.

Samuel L. Howe, an old and prominent citizen of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, died recently at that place, aged 69 years. Mr. Howe was born in Vermont in 1808, and when 10 years of age moved to Granville, Ohio, with his parents. Subsequently he entered the Ohio State University at Athens, where he supported himself by chopping wood. Without graduating he established an academy of his own at Lancaster, Ohio, where he taught for six years, and during this time fitted Gen. Sherman and his brother, the United States Senator, for college. In 1838 he published a Philotaxian grammar. In 1841 he removed with his family to Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and two years later he established what is now the oldest high-school in the State. In 1845 he built an academy which, with additions since made, is one of the largest in the West. In 1849 he became one of the editors of the Iowa Freeman, the first anti-slavery newspaper in that State. Soon after he became the sole editor of the paper, when he changed its name to the Iowa True Democrat. He was uncompromising in his views, and was generally recognized as the leader of the Free Soil Party in Iowa. In 1856 he sold his paper, and since that time has devoted himself wholly to teaching. He was held in high esteem by all who knew him, especially by his pupils, who regarded him as their friend and benefactor.

STATE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

RONDOUT, Feb. 27.—Active steps have been taken to properly celebrate the centennial of the State at Kingston. The convention which formed the first Constitution met there. The election for Governor and other State officers was held, and, 100 years ago on the 30th of July, George Clinton was inaugurated first Governor at the Kingston Courthouse and the first Legislature was organized. A committee comprising Mayor James G. Lindsley, Judge T. R. Westbrook, Hon. Thomas Cornell, A. B. Hasbrouck, Major Gen. George H. Sharpe, Hon. S. L. Stebbins, Hon. William Lounsbery, and other prominent citizens have the affair in charge, and the celebration will be on a grand scale. The State and national authorities are to be invited and the event is to be made one of the most memorable of centennial observances. Arrangements are also to be made to commemorate the burning of Kingston by British troops on the 16th of October, 1777.

STRIKERS OBSTRUCTING MAILS.

PORTLAND, Feb. 27.—At a hearing to-day in the case of Walker, Shaw, and Stone, engineers, charged with obstructing mails on the Boston and Maine Railroad, the first two named were discharged, and Stone was held in $1,000 for trial in the United States District Court.

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

WAS DR. LYNCH MURDERED?

THE THEORY THAT HE DIED FROM POISON CONFIRMED BY THE POST-MORTEM EXAMINATION—SUSPICIOUS ACTIONS OF BERNARD CONKLIN — CIRCUMSTANCES ATTENDING THE TRAGEDY—THE DOCTOR'S CAREER IN THIS CITY.

The suspicion that the sudden death of Dr. John Lynch, in a room of the tenement-house No. 228 West Twenty-eighth-street, on Monday evening, was caused by poison, was confirmed yesterday at the post-mortem examination of the body. Until an analysis of the stomach is completed, the precise nature of the deadly agent will not be known; nor has it been definitely ascertained whether the poison was administered by the man Conklin, who cannot be found, or was taken by the Doctor himself. One circumstance, the fact that Conklin was seen to give the Doctor some liquid from a vial, points strongly to the truth of the former theory. If such were really the case, it is regarded as probable that Conklin administered the drug as a medicament; for apparently there existed no motive which could be looked upon as a sufficient inducement for murder. The two men were evidently on friendly terms. It is asserted that the unfortunate physician had neither money nor valuables of any description on his person. On the other hand, the friends of Dr. Lynch scout the idea of suicide, and at the same time question the supposition that Conklin could have been so blind or ignorant as to administer as a medicament what appears to have been an irritant poison. The autopsy, which was performed by Deputy Coroner Goldschmidt, in the presence of Coroner Ellinger, Dr. Finnell, and Dr. Patrick J. Lynch, a brother of the deceased, revealed the following facts as to the condition of the internal organs: Intense congestion of the lungs; turgescence of the vessels of the right side of the heart; heart enlarged and somewhat fatty; liver very fatty; kidneys both extensively diseased and in an advanced stage of fatty degeneration, with cirrhosis; stomach intensely congested and inflamed, presenting a dark, bloody appearance, more apparent in the larger curvation; the mucous membrane corroded and ulcerated, and in some instances entirely absent, in others exfoliatory and easily removed. This process of inflammation commenced about the middle of the æsophagus, and extended down about 15 or 20 inches to the small intestines, and then gradually losing itself, death was caused by some irritant poison, the nature of which cannot be ascertained. The death certificate issued by the Coroner read as follows: "John Lynch, Ireland, 25 years in the United States; cause—some irritant poison taken into the stomach, supposed to have been administered by a friend about five hours before the deceased was found dead. The nature of the poison could not be ascertained without analysis."

The circumstances surrounding the visit of Dr. Lynch to the apartments of Henry Shea, No. 228 West Twenty-eighth-street, where he died soon after, were as follows: The man who introduced him to the Shea family is supposed to be Bernard Conklin, a printer, who has worked as a "nuj" in the Sun press-room. In the latter part of December last this man rented one of the rooms on the floor occupied by the Sheas, and lived there with a woman whom he represented to be his wife until Jan. 26, when Mrs. Shea ejected the couple for non-payment of rent, retaining, in lieu of same, a trunk belonging to them. On Friday last Conklin, who, it appears, was rather intimate with Dr. Lynch, called with that gentleman on Mrs. Shea, and introduced the Doctor as desirous of renting the room which Conklin had vacated, and at the same time suggested to the woman that Dr. Lynch would be a convenient person to have in the house during her approaching confinement. The physician did not, however, rent the room then, but promised to call again. In accordance with this assurance he went there alone on Monday at 1 o'clock, and while speaking to Mrs. Shea complained of a feeling of exhaustion. Mrs. Shea invited him to sit on a lounge in the room, and just then Conklin entered the apartment. Hearing that the Doctor was not well, he requested permission of the woman to remove his friend to an adjoining bedroom. As they entered the room Conklin produced from a pocket of his coat a long vial, similar to those used for Munn's Elixir of Opium, containing a brownish liquid. This he handed to the physician, who, at his suggestion, swallowed a large portion of the contents, and then lay down on the bed. Conklin, returning the vial to his pocket, left the house, after asking Mrs. Shea to "let the Doctor rest for a while." About half an hour later the woman heard Dr. Lynch breathing very heavily but gave the circumstance no attention. At 9 o'clock Miss Briscoe, a boarder, entered the room, and discovered that the Doctor was dead. Shea notified the Police of the Twentieth Precinct, who informed the Coroner, but apparently made no effort to find Conklin or to obtain an accurate description of him. Yesterday Coroner Ellinger supplied them with a warrant for the arrest of the man, and the document was given to Patrolman Thomas Reilly, who, accompanied by Shea, visited the haunts of the missing man, but did not succeed in finding any trace of him. It is said Dr. Lynch instituted a suit some time ago against the father of ex-Judge Ledwith for the recovery of a debt, and the following letter found on the body probably has connection with the litigation:

OFFICE OF WILLIAM J. HYLAND.

FRIEND L.: I have seen and conversed with L. in re. your matter. From what he said I am unable to give any assurance that the claim can be on any basis properly adjusted. I wish you to know, as I have given L. to understand, that my present and past connection with the matter is, and has been, in the unenviable position of neutral friend. From further interference I claim the privilege of exemption. Believe me ever yours, W. J. HYLAND.

Dr. Lynch, who, at the time of his death, was 34 years of age, was, up to a comparatively recent period, a well-known and popular practitioner in this City. The events of the last years of his life furnish a painful picture of the depth of degradation and penury to which excessive intemperance sinks men of even eminent talents and independent fortunes. He was born in Ireland, and coming to this country during his boyhood, entered the medical department of the University of the City of New-York, where he received his medical education. He was graduated in 1863, and soon after opened an office in Houston-street, near Sullivan, where, with the assistance of his personal friend and tutor, Dr. Finnell, he became very popular with the residents of that portion of the City, and established a practice from which accrued an income averaging from $7,000 to $10,000 yearly. Professionally, he possessed eminent ability, and was several years ago chosen House Surgeon of St. Vincent Hospital, a position which he filled during a period of 12 months. About five years ago his finances became exceedingly embarrassed, and his practice, in consequence, decreased perceptibly. He subsequently removed his office to No. 331 West Thirty-second-street, where ex-Judge Ledwith, Fathers Ducey and Donnelly, and some influential members of St. Michael's Catholic Church interested themselves in his welfare. Being completely enslaved by his fatal love for drink, he did not succeed in materially bettering his condition, his list of patients having dwindled to a few. J. E. Gilson, the landlord of the house, ejected him about five months ago, since which time he has had no permanent residence or office. The last month of his existence was spent in an uninterrupted debauch. The body of the unfortunate physician was claimed by his brother, Dr. Patrick J. Lynch, who ordered its removal to his residence, No. 216 East Thirteenth-street.

The stomach of the dead man was placed in a sealed jar, and sent to the Coroner's office for the purpose of an analysis, and the kidney was given to Dr. Finnell for examination.

THE COUNCIL OF POLITICAL REFORM.

The Council of Political Reform met on Monday evening, at its rooms, No. 48 East Twenty-third-street, W. H. Webb presiding. After the usual routine business had been transacted, the representative of the Council at the Legislature made his statement of the steps taken to promote the passage of the several bills before the Legislature for improving the public affairs of this City, and to oppose such legislation as would be detrimental to the public interests. Whereupon the representative at the Legislature was instructed to oppose all bills asking appropriations for local improvements in this City, (such as parks, avenues, &c.,) as by existing laws the City possesses all the powers needed to make any public improvement that is required. The matter of the proposed site and accompanying street of the New-York terminus of the viaduct of the Brooklyn Bridge was discussed, and then referred, with power, to a special committee. It was

Resolved, That this Council has full confidence in the capacity, integrity, and fidelity of Allan Campbell, Esq., the present Commissioner of Public Works, that they are opposed to, and shall oppose all efforts to remove him from the position that he now holds, or to shorten his term of office, and they believe such efforts to be hostile to the public interests.

This resolution was directed to be sent to the Mayor, Common Council, and the members of the Legislature.

MISS HIGGINS' SWINDLING BOARDER.

John L. Davis, the young man who is charged with swindling Miss Annie Higgins, of No. 57 West Twenty-first street, was arraigned before Justice Flammer, at the Washington-place Police Court, yesterday. Miss Higgins made a formal complaint against him, her affidavit embodying the facts in relation to the $75 check which have already been published. Mr. James Striker, Cashier of the Murray Hill Bank, made an affidavit that the check was worthless, as Davis had no funds to his credit at the bank, and his account there was closed in 1874. Davis pleaded not guilty, and was committed for trial in default of bail. There was another charge of swindling preferred against Davis by Mr. William H. Carew, a jeweler, of No. 206 Broadway, who alleged that on Sept. 2, 1876, Davis, with whom he was well acquainted, called at his store and purchased diamonds and jewelry to the amount of $198. He tendered in payment therefor a check for that amount on the Murray Hill Bank, and on Davis' representations that the check was good, Mr. Carew took it and delivered the jewelry to Davis. The next day he learned that the check was worthless. Davis also pleaded not guilty to this charge, and was committed for trial also in default of bail. It was asserted in court that a number of other charges of a similar nature will be made against him.

MR. COMMISSIONER CAMPBELL.

MEETING OF THE MUNICIPAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE CHARGES AGAINST HIM—FAILURE TO SUBSTANTIATE THEM—FAVORABLE RECORD MADE BY THE HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT.

The Aldermanic Committee on Public Works held an animated session yesterday, during which they discussed the charges which were preferred by Mr. Tuomey against Commissioner Campbell. Mr. Tuomey asserted before the Common Council, of which he is a member, that Mr. Campbell neglected his official duties, and that he could not have given them the attention they required while he was President of the Consolidation Coal Company. Since this charge was made, however, Mr. Campbell has been succeeded by another gentleman in the latter office, and therefore, in the language of a member of the committee, the cause of complaint, even if there was any ground for it, was removed. But Mr. Tuomey was not to be pacified in this way. He expressed his determination to make other charges against the Commissioner of Public Works, and for that purpose he appeared before the committee. It is known that the quarrel which Mr. Tuomey has espoused originated in a contest for patronage from the Department of Public Works, a contest in which the Tammany City Fathers were routed.

The committee met at 3 o'clock. It consists of Aldermen Sheils, Joyce, Salmon, Simonson, and Pinckney. The two latter are Republicans and the other members are Tammany men. Col. Wingate appeared in behalf of Mr. Campbell, who was too ill to attend.

Mr. Tuomey was the first to address the committee. He said that the charges he had made against Mr. Campbell were true, but he supposed that, as the Commissioner had ceased to be President of the coal company, it would not be necessary to take any action on the charge on that point. But he wanted to prefer another charge. Commissioner Campbell had appointed as his deputy Mr. Hubert O. Thompson, a man who had not the requisite qualifications for the position. He was at one time a clerk in the department at $900 a year.

Alderman Sheils—Then your charge is that the deputy has not sufficient experience?

Alderman Tuomey—Yes; I say he is not fit for the office.

Alderman Pinckney—Tweed was at one time connected with the Public Works, but he was not an engineer. Is it necessary for a deputy to be an engineer? What qualifications had Mr. Gumbleton, the Deputy Commissioner who preceded Mr. Thompson, that Mr. Thompson has not got?

Alderman Tuomey made no answer to this question, but simply repeated that Mr. Thompson should not have been appointed.

Col. Wingate here stepped forward and said that the charge that Commissioner Campbell held two positions could be easily disposed of. The Presidency of the Consolidation Coal Company, which he had held, was not a position within the meaning of the charter. Although he had relinquished the duties of that office, the holding of it did not prevent him from attending to his duties as Commissioner of Public Works—duties which he had performed to the satisfaction of the public. For four years he had charge of the Fourth-avenue improvement, a great work, which was finished within the amount named in the estimates. The Commissionership of Public Works had been offered to him when he had charge of that improvement, but he declined it. He did accept the position when he had time to perform all its duties. He was then receiving a salary of $12,000 a year as President of the coal company, and it was not to be expected that he would resign that office to take one at $10,000. It was stated in the resolution before the Aldermen that Mr. Campbell's course had caused demoralization in his department. But such was not the fact. On the contrary, he has made his department what it should be. He has removed inefficient employes, and established the principle that promotion shall be based on efficient services and experience. The time of the attachés of his office was not taken up with applications for places. Since he assumed office he has saved $1,500,000 to the City. Of this amount, $1,000,000 was saved by adopting the contract system and abolishing the old system of day's work, and $500,000 has been saved by now proceeding with various works which would cost that amount. As to the charge in relation to Mr. Thompson, it was easy to reply to it. Commissioner Campbell found him in his office, and after a full knowledge of his qualifications, appointed him as his Secretary. He was far more familiar with the duties of the department than any man whom Mr. Campbell found there, and therefore he was appointed to the office of deputy. Mr. Thompson was regarded by the Commissioner as in every way competent for the position, and therefore he selected him.

Alderman Sheils and other members of the committee here asked Col. Wingate how Mr. Campbell effected a saving of $1,500,000 for this City, and he repeated the statements he had previously made on the subject, and then submitted the following report of the Department of Public Works.

EXPENDITURES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS FOR THE LAST FIVE YEARS:

1872	$5,826,112
1873	7,647,836
1874	7,809,131
1875	5,919,752
1876	4,307,095

The reduction of expenditures for the past year as Compared with 1875 is $1,502,656 78
Compared with 1874 is 3,252,036 40
Compared with 1873 is 3,290,741 03
Compared with 1872 is 1,469,017 27

A separate comparison of each class of expenditures for the several years and the amount of work done shows that the reductions are principally the result of economy and the abolition of the day's work system, and not of any proportionate decrease in the work.

The current business of the department, viz., the maintenance of the Croton water system, streets, roads, sewers, buildings, public lamps, &c., has been increased within five years by the transfer of the Out-door Poor in June, 1872; the consolidation of the City and County Governments in 1873, and the annexation of the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards in 1874, as well as by the constant additions to street pavements, sewers, and water-pipes to be maintained, yet the expenditure on these accounts has been thus reduced as follows:

Average expenditures for four years preceding 1876	$1,672,053 82
Expenditure for 1876	1,451,023 99
Reduction	$221,029 83

On the expenditures for street improvements the reduction is $1,391,008 80, as compared with the previous year, and $1,633,678 23, as compared with the average annual expenditure for the four years preceding 1876. About 40 per cent. of these reductions is due to a decrease in the amount of work carried on, while the remaining 60 per cent. may be credited to the abolition of the day's work system and the shrinkage of prices for contract work. An idea of the saving effected by the substitution of contracts for day's work may be formed by comparing the average cost of work under each, as follows:

Nature of work.	Av'ge cost by da's w'k.	Av'ge cost by cont't.
Rock excavation, per cubic yard..	$4 72	$ 87
Earth excavation, per cubic yard..	1 32	22
Earth filling, per cubic yard.....	1 57	22
Curb and gutter, per lineal foot ...	1 58	42
Flagging, per square foot.....	32	13
Telford macadam roadway, per square yard.....	4 01	1 66
Receiving basins, each.....	450 00	119 00

In the expenditures for the improvement and extension of the Croton water system proportionally the greatest saving has been effected, as the principal portion of that work, the laying of water-pipes, was formerly done by day's work, and is now carried on by contract, and a reduction of 30 per cent., or about $80,000, in the cost of every mile has been secured by a supplementary agreement to the old contract for furnishing pipes.

The following are the quantities of pipe laid and the cost of the same for the past five years:

Year.	Quantity. Tons.	Total Cost.	Cost Per Ton.
1872	5,880	$901,808 47	$136 36
1873	9,245	1,291,219 87	139 66
1874	4,796	799,183 19	138 65
1875	1,484	271,468 72	181 28
1876	3,520	339,865 14	96 55

This report was ordered on file, after which the committee adjourned until Wednesday next.

Mr. Hubert O. Thompson, the Deputy Commissioner of Public Works, has been connected with that department for several years. He received a salary of $2,250 per annum as chief clerk in the Water Bureau.

CARAMEL COLORING LAWFUL.

United States District Attorney Woodford is of opinion that under the law no action will be against the importers of sugar which has been found to be discolored with caramel. The Collector disclaims any imputation upon the integrity of those gentlemen. They have only been profiting by a very sharp trick. The statute requires sugars to be graded according to color. It says nothing about the quantity of saccharine matter they may contain, and there is no clause forbidding the importer to have his goods of any shade he may desire. The suit that is to be brought is merely to be a test case looking to an amendment of the law which will make similar evasions impossible in future.

THE HEIRS DISSATISFIED.

COMMODORE VANDERBILT'S WILL.

ITS PROBATE CONTESTED BY CORNELIUS J. VANDERBILT, MRS. ALLEN, AND MRS. LA BAU—THE HEARING SET DOWN PEREMPTORILY FOR NEXT TUESDAY WEEK—SCENES IN THE SURROGATE'S COURT.

Such a crowd assembled in the Surrogate's office yesterday morning that his Honor, contrary to precedent, ordered the papers to be sent to the court-room, and thither all the parties subsequently proceeded, filling the room about two-thirds full. Nearly all were lawyers or curiosity seekers. Mr. William H. Vanderbilt was present, but Cornelius was absent. None of the female members of the family were in the room. Among the audience were Hon. Augustus Schell, Judge Rapallo, Rev. Sidney Ahorey, Edwin D. Worcester, Joseph Harper, S. Derickson, Francis P. Freeman, and other intimates of the dead Commodore. At a few minutes past 10 o'clock the Surrogate rapped for order and called up the "Matter of the will of the late Cornelius Vanderbilt, deceased." Mr. Henry L. Clinton arose and said that he appeared in behalf of the proponents of the will. The attesting witnesses were all present, and unless there should be a disposition shown to contest the will he should move to prove it. He would ask his Honor to call the several next of kin and hear what they had to say.

Mr. Calvin said that several applications and notices had been filed in his office. Mr. Clinton asked to be allowed to see them, and they were handed to him. One is by Messrs. James Matthews and David Dudley Field on behalf of Mrs. Allen. Another is by Messrs. Ethan Allen, Jeremiah S. Black, and Scott Lord on behalf of Cornelius J. Vanderbilt. The third is by Mr. Sutherland Tenney on behalf of Mrs La. Bau. They are merely formal notices of appearance in the usual form. Mr. Clinton asked if there were any others. Mr. Chauncey M. Depew said that he appeared on behalf of Mrs. Maria Louise Clark and Mrs. Catharine Lafitte. The Surrogate directed him to put his notice into writing, which he at once proceeded to do. Mr. Clinton said that four or five of the heirs had put in no appearance. He thought it proper to state that Mrs. Torrance and Mrs. Thorne had notified him that they would interpose no objections to the probate of the will.

Young Mr. Field then arose and said: If your Honor pleases, I and Mr. Matthews and my father, Mr. David Dudley Field, appear on behalf of Mrs. Allen. Mr. David Dudley Field, our senior, is, as you are aware, at present in Congress, devoting all his time and business to the service of the country. We think it only proper to consult him before filing our objections to the will. We would therefore ask that the hearing stand over for a fortnight, when we will agree that the case must and shall proceed, unless some unfortunate complication should arise in Congress in the meantime that will require Mr. Field's further attendance there. As things stand now, however, I see nothing to prevent our going on at that date.

Mr. Ethan Allen then took the floor. He said he could only repeat what Mr. Field had just said. He and his associates appeared for Mr. Cornelius J. Vanderbilt, one of the heirs, to contest the will. Mr. Lord was at present serving his time as [illegible] (correcting himself,) term—[smiles,] in Congress, and would not be at liberty until the 4th of March. Judge Black would also probably be engaged there until the same date. Before filing his objections, counsel would like an opportunity to confer with those gentlemen, which he had not yet done.

Mr. Clinton—I understand the purpose of counsel to be to contest the will.

Mr. Allen—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Field—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Clinton—It is not usual to proceed with the contest of a will on the day of filing notice; so I have no objection to offer to a reasonable adjournment. First, however, I would like to know whether there are to be any more contestants. How about Mrs. La Bau?

Mr. Tenney—I appear for Mrs. La Bau, and would state that she will probably contest. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. Depew—I assent, on the part of Mrs. Clark and Mrs. Lafitte, to the probate of the will. We do not contest.

Mr. Clinton—Mrs. Torrance and Mrs. Thorne have notified us that they will not contest. In regard to an adjournment, Judge Rapallo, of the Court of Appeals, one of the subscribing witnesses to both the will and the codicil, is obliged to go to Albany on Friday week. I suggest that the adjournment take place to a week from Thursday, so as to enable us to examine him before he leaves. But I give notice to counsel that we will insist that the case proceed on the adjourned day, and that we are unwilling to grant any further delays.

Mr. Field—Your Honor, the 5th of March, which is the 4th of March for all political purposes, falls on Monday. We must presuppose that every movement of our senior counsel's time will be fully occupied until that date. Then there is the journey to this City. Really, the time suggested by my learned brother is too short. I don't see why this case should take a different course from that of other estates merely because it is a large one. I don't think we are asking any very great favor from counsel. As to Judge Rapallo, the contest will necessarily be a prolonged one, and as he is only one of six witnesses, may be examined or ordered of examining him. As to the suggestion of counsel that no more time should be granted us, I beg to say that we propose to go on when the time comes with all due diligence usual to laborious lawyers in the prosecution of a suit; but I hope that no such time will be imposed upon us. I know of no peculiar exigency in this case that should demand them, except, perhaps, its magnitude. We shall make our contest in good faith.

Mr. Clinton—If counsel agree that the case shall go on on the adjourned day, I consent to an adjournment of two weeks. I would like to have the several objections served upon me three or four days prior to that date.

Surrogate Calvin—I was about to decide that objections must be served upon counsel for proponents on or before Friday, March 9, and that the hearing is set down peremptorily for Tuesday, two weeks from to-day, at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Field—That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Clinton—It is entirely agreeable to us.

Mr. Calvin asked whether the hour named suited all the counsel, and they answered that it did. Mr. Calvin then said that he would set down no other case for that day, and in a few moments the court-room was deserted.

MR. WILLIAM H. VANDERBILT EXPRESSES HIS VIEWS.

A TIMES reporter called upon Mr. William H. Vanderbilt yesterday, at his residence on Fifth-avenue, to ascertain his intentions regarding the coming contest. Mr. Vanderbilt, while inclined to reticence, did not hesitate to say that he intended standing by the will, and hinted that no scheme for a compromise would be entertained by him for a moment. His father, who knew his children much better than any one else, had seen fit to distribute his property among them according to what he deemed for the best interests of all concerned. To some he had given more than to others, but all had received a handsome competence. To say that such a will could be broken because the testator had not divided his substance equally among all his heirs was sheer nonsense. There was no use in any one making a will if the law was to step in in the end and annul its provisions. The principle involved was one that appealed to every man in the community who had $1,000 to leave. Of the parties who had brought about the present contest there were only two—Cornelius J. Vanderbilt and Mrs. Allen—who had positively stated their intention of going on with it. The third—Mrs. La Bau—was not yet certain whether she would continue her opposition. Of the 10 children of the Commodore, seven had given in their adherence to the provisions of the instrument. But, whether they had or not, there could be no serious question of his father's right to leave the bulk of his wealth as he pleased.
